The United States Government has concluded [1] that the USSR has violated its legal obligation under or political commitment to: The SALT I ABM Treaty and Interim Agreement; the SALT II Treaty; the Geneva Protocal on Chemical Weapons as it reflects the rules of customary international law; the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention; the Limited Test Ban Treaty; and the Helsinki Final Act.

In addition, the United States Government has concluded that it is likely that the USSR has violated the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. Furthermore, the United States Government is concerned about the Soviet Union's ABM and ABM-related actions which suggest that the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

While we remain concerned about Soviet violations of Basket I of the Helsinki Final Act and the Limited Test Ban Treaty, there is no unambiguous evidence of new 1985 Soviet violations of these two treaties. With regard to the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention, or the Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons, there also is no clear evidence of new 1985 Soviet lethal attacks that meets our strict standards of evidence. However, the Soviets clearly remain in violation of the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention.

The apparent removal of SS-16 equipment from Plesetsk during 1985 changes the status of the SS-16 which had previously been judged to have been probably deployed at Plesetsk in probable violation of the Soviet Union's legal obligation and political commitment.

Nevertheless, the President's Report to the Congress on Soviet Noncompliance With Arms Control Agreements, December 23, 1985, states:

"The Soviet Union has thus far not provided explanations sufficient to alleviate our concerns on these issues, nor has the Soviet Union taken actions needed to correct existing violations. Instead, they have continued to assert that they are in complete compliance with their arms control obligations and commitments."

The U.S. Government has determined that the Soviets have violated their commitments in nine cases and probably violated them in others. The following is an abbreviated summary of the findings. Specific and precise findings on each issue, with explanations, are contained in the report text.

While these violations constitute a most disturbing pattern of Soviet behavior,[2] the Soviets have adhered to many if not most provisions of the treaties to which they are a Party. However, selective compliance is not enough. Parties to agreements are required to honor all obligations and commitments.

Many Soviet violations can still be remedied. We hope they are. Over the past several years, however, the Soviet Union has neither provided satisfactory explanations nor undertaken corrective actions which would bring them into full compliance with their solemn arms control obligations.

The United States will continue diplomatic efforts to have the Soviet Union correct these problems. We have vigorously pressed, and will continue to press, compliance issues with the Soviets. This is done in the Standing Consultative Commission, the Nuclear and Space Talks, and through other diplomatic channels.

We will continue to try to negotiate new agreements with the Soviet Union, even if they are violating existing ones, for several reasons:

First, we are continuing to press the Soviet Union for clarifications, explanations and corrective action, and have made clear that we will consider proportionate and appropriate action in response to Soviet noncompliance.

Second, the U.S. believes that equitable arms reduction agreements with provisions that are effectively verifiable will, if complied with, enhance stability and security. New arms control agreements, if soundly formulated and adhered to, can serve U.S. interests. We should not abandon efforts to achieve agreements that can increase U.S. and Allied security and reduce the risk of war, provided that such agreements are effective and verifiable.

Third, negotiating with the Soviets does not in any way condone or ignore past Soviet behavior. Continuing to negotiate can give us leverage and is another way to try to get the Soviets to abide by existing agreements.

Compliance is an issue of widespread concern throughout the U.S. Government, in the legislative as well as executive branches and among those of all political persuasions. It is a truly bipartisan issue. A group of leading Democratic Congressmen has, for example, written the Soviet leader of its concerns over Soviet violations.[3] They stated "that adherence to existing treaties is a necessity in order for future agreements to be possible."

Given the importance of the compliance issue and the technical nature of much of the material which has been written about it, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has prepared this unclassified report. It spells out the obligations and actions of the Soviet Union in its major arms control commitments, and where and how the U.S. Government has determined that the USSR is in violation. In some cases where concerns have been raised over Soviet adherence to specific provisions we studied the issue and have not found the Soviets in violation, as had been feared.

Of course, since this report is unclassified, much of the evidence presented in the extensive classified Presidential reports to the Congress cannot be presented here. We have tried to minimize the possible distortions and gaps in the evidence that result from the restrictions of classification and the need to protect the sources and methods of our verification capabilities. Moreover, the report makes clear that not all Soviet violations and probable violations are of equal severity, clarity, or impact. Indeed, while some of the individual violations have serious military significance others do not. Nonetheless, a continuing pattern of Soviet violations cannot help but have a long-term impact upon our national security.

In addition, any violation inherently carries serious implications for arms control. The integrity of the system and sanctity of a nation's commitments are critical. So we dare not ignore even small Soviet violations much less large ones. Regardless of their particular military significance, violations jeopardize the process and framework, particularly where there is a pattern of behavior. Failure to respond appropriately might lead the Soviets to think that they can violate their commitments with impunity.

Compliance is everybody's business. The universal importance of full compliance was recently recognized by the United Nations. On December 12, 1985, the General Assembly passed by a vote of 131-0 (with 16 abstentions) a resolution on arms control compliance which:

Urges all parties to arms limitation and disarmament agreements to comply with their provisions;

Calls upon those parties to consider the implications of noncompliance for international security and stability and for the prospects for further progress in the field of disarmament; and

Appeals to all U.N. members to support efforts to resolve noncompliance questions "with a view toward encouraging strict observance of the provisions subscribed to and maintaining or restoring the integrity of arms limitation or disarmament agreements."

It is in this light that we offer our report to the American people, and to foreign audiences as well, as a useful guide while we seek to make progress in resolving compliance issues and in moving ahead on arms control in the future.

ABM TREATY

The Treaty Between the U.S. and the USSR on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems (ABM Treaty) entered into force in 1972. The Protocol to the ABM Treaty entered into force in 1976. The ABM Treaty is of unlimited duration and subject to review by the Parties at 5-year intervals.

The ABM Treaty and its Protocol ban deployment of ABM systems except that each Party is permitted to deploy one ABM system around the national capital area or, alternatively, at a single ICMB deployment area. However, the Treaty explicitly recognizes the existence of ABM test ranges for the development and testing of ABM systems or components for modernization and replacement.

1. THE KRASNOYARSK RADAR

Limitations on large phased-array radars are one of the core priorities of the ABM Treaty. Large phased-array radars constitute the most critical and the longest-lead time components needed for a prohibited territorial ABM system. The ABM Treaty permits the deployment of new large phased-array radars (LPARs) as:

a. ABM radars within the ABM deployment area;

b. ABM radars at one of the current or additionally agreed ABM test ranges;

c. radars for early warning of strategic ballistic missile attack provided that they are located along the periphery of the deploying Party's national territory and are oriented outward;

d. radars used for the purpose of tracking objects in outer space; and

e. radars used as national technical means (NTM) of verfication.

"Deploy" as used in Article VI of the ABM Treaty means to site or locate at a particular location. Initiation of the construction of a prohibited radar would constitute a violation of the Treaty.

[2] Soviet practices were also studied in a report to the President by the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control, an independent Presidential advisory committee. That study also concluded that the Soviets had violated many arms control obligations. (Report to the President by the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control, "A Quarter Century of Soviet Compliance Practices Under Arms Control Commitments: 1950-83 (Summary)," October 1984.)

The United States has detected construction of a large phased-array radar in the interior of the USSR near Krasnoyarsk. It is not located within the permitted ABM deployment area, and it is not located at an agreed ABM test range. The radar is over 700 kilometers from the USSR's nearest border—the border with Mongolia. The Krasnoyarsk radar is not directed outward toward the Mongolian border but, rather, looks inward toward the Soviet Union's northeast border—4,600 kilometers away. It thus overlooks a large portion of the Soviet Union and from there toward Alaska and beyond. The radar is of a type previously characterized by the Soviet government as a radar for the early warning of missile attacks.

The Soviets claim that the Krasnoyarsk radar is for space tracking and NTM. The claim is not credible. To place that claim in perspective requires comparing the Krasnoyarsk radar's capabilities with the requirements for those missions and with existing Soviet capabilities.

There are two fundamental tasks a radar designed for tracking of space objects should perform: (1) early satellite detection; and (2) accurate satellite tracking.

If the role of the Krasnoyarsk radar were primarily satellite tracking, it should be appropriately designed and oriented to improve the accuracy of the existing system of Soviet satellite tracking radars. It is not so designed or oriented. Its contribution to tracking was analyzed for many different cases of possible U.S. and Soviet satellite launches and orbits. In no case that we have analyzed did the radar at Krasnoyarsk contribute significantly to the satellite tracking accuracy that was already available from existing Soviet radars. Indeed, in most cases it contributes very little or nothing to existing Soviet space tracking capabilities.

The Krasnoyarsk radar's orientation is far from that optimal for space tracking; it cannot be used to track current Soviet spacecraft during their initial ("insertion") portion of flight. Its most useful area of space coverage is already largely within the view of other more appropriately designed radars. In sum, it is not plausible that the Krasnoyarsk radar is for space tracking. In fact, we think the Soviets would certainly not build an expensive and ineffectively designed radar for this purpose to gain only a marginal increase in space-track capability.

To perform in an NTM role a radar should have the capability to monitor testing or deployment of U.S. systems limited by treaty. The capabilities, location and orientation of the Krasnoyarsk radar preclude this function.

The radar under construction near Krasnoyarsk in Siberia is disturbing for both political and military reasons. Politically, the radar demonstrates that the Soviets are capable of violating arms control obligations and commitments even when they are negotiating with the United States or when they know we will detect a violation. The 1972 ABM Treaty prohibits the Soviets from siting an ABM radar, or siting and orienting a ballistic missile detection and tracking radar, as the Krasnoyarsk radar is sited and oriented.

Militarily, the Krasnoyarsk radar violation goes to the heart of the ABM Treaty. Large phased-array radars (LPARs) like that under construction near Krasnoyarsk were recognized during the ABM Treaty negotiations as the critical long leadtime element of a nationwide ABM defense.

The Krasnoyarsk radar is well located for ballistic missile warning, attack assessment and ABM target acquisition and tracking. Its location provides better impact prediction data for much of the central USSR (for example, for ICBM sites) than locations along the northeastern coast. It could have major significance if it is part of a large scale future Soviet ABM deployment. This new radar closes the final gap in the combined HEN HOUSE and new large phased-array radar warning and tracking network. Together, this radar and the five others like it form an arc of coverage from the Kola Peninsula in the northwest, around Siberia, to the Caucasus in the Southwest. Its orientation and function indicate it is for ballistic missile detection and tracking—not space object tracking and NTM as claimed by the Soviets.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges that the new large phased-array radar under construction at Krasnoyarsk constitutes a violation of legal obligations under the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 in that in its associated siting, orientation, and capability, it is prohibited by this Treaty. Continuing construction and the absence of credible alternative explanations have reinforced our assessment of its purposes. Despite U.S. requests, no corrective action has been taken. This and other ABM-related activities suggest that the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

2. MOBILITY OF ABM SYSTEM COMPONENTS

The ABM Treaty explicitly prohibits the development, testing, or deployment of mobile land-based ABM systems or components, including ABM interceptor missiles, ABM launchers, and ABM radars. The Term "mobile" used in the Treaty describes components which can be readily transported from one place to another as well as components designed to be moved frequently during their service life, even if these components are not mobile in the sense of having wheels or being self-propelled. If readily transportable components were developed, it was feared that they could be used to deploy rapidly a nationwide-ABM system which is prohibited by the Treaty.

In evaluating whether an ABM component is "mobile" the ability of that component to be easily moved is more important than how many times a party has in fact moved it. Whether or not a component is mobile depends on how much time is necessary to relocate it and reestablish a fully operational capability. Judgments of the mobility of Soviet ABM components can be made without the component ever in fact being moved.

The testing or deployment of even a single mobile land-based ABM component would constitute a violation of the ABM Treaty.

The Soviet ABM program includes development and testing of interceptor missiles, the launchers for those missiles and associated radars. The Soviets have tested ABM components that are apparently designed so that they could be relocated in months rather than in terms of the years required to deploy fixed land-based systems.

The concern is that by using mobile components the Soviets could deploy a large number of ABM launchers by the early 1990s, if they make such a decision soon. Such developments could have significant adverse impacts on the military balance.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges that evidence of Soviet actions with respect to ABM component mobility is ambiguous, but that the USSR's development and testing of components of an ABM system, which apparently are designed to be deployable at sites requiring relatively limited site preparation, represents a potential violation of its legal obligation under the ABM Treaty. This and other ABM-related Soviet actions suggest that the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

3. CONCURRENT TESTING OF ABM AND AIR DEFENSE COMPONENTS

Under the ABM Treaty, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed that they would not give missiles, launchers, or radars, that were developed for other purposes, e.g., for air defense, the capability to counter strategic ballistic missiles or their elements in flight trajectory nor to test them in an ABM mode.

Subsequent to the 1972 signing of the ABM Treaty, the U.S. obtained data indicating that the Soviet Union might be developing an ABM capability with non-ABM components by conducting tests involving the concurrent operation of non-ABM and ABM components. The U.S. then expressed its concern about these tests to the Soviet Union and the tests of that kind appeared to stop. However, after another relatively brief period, the U.S. again obtained data that raised concern. Following renewed detailed discussion with the Soviets, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed in the 1970s to prohibit concurrent testing of air defense components and ABM system components at the same test range. However, even after this agreement, concurrent operations appeared to resume.

Both the U.S. and the USSR understood that air defense radars, when operated for air defense purposes or to ensure the safety of the range or as instrumentation radars for permitted purposes, would not be in violation of a prohibition on concurrent testing.

The many occasions when Soviet ABM and SAM radars were operating at about the same time, as well as the fact that these activities have persisted over the past decade, are themselves a basis for concern. This concern is heightened by the unsatisfactory response of the Soviets to U.S. requests for explanations and corrective actions. For these activities not to be violations one must accept that on each and every occasion SAM radar operation was for defense or safety of the range or as instrumentation equipment for permitted purposes. We have strong circumstantial evidence of improper Soviet concurrent testing of SAM and ABM radars.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges that the evidence of Soviet actions with respect to concurrent operations is insufficient fully to assess compliance with Soviet obligations under the ABM Treaty. However, the Soviet Union has conducted tests that have involved air defense radars in ABM-related activities. The large number and consistency over time, of incidents of concurrent operation of ABM and SAM components, plus Soviet failure to accommodate fully U.S. concerns, indicate the USSR probably has violated the prohibition on testing SAM components in an ABM mode. In several cases this may be highly probable. This and other such Soviet activities suggest the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

4. ABM CAPABILITIES OF MODERN SURFACE-TO-AIR MISSILE (SAM) SYSTEMS

The ABM Treaty sets forth two separate prohibitions on SAM systems—not to give such systems capabilities to counter strategic ballistic missiles and not to test such systems in an ABM mode.

When the ABM Treaty was negotiated, the potential ABM capability of air defense systems was a major concern. Clearly, the phrase "capabilities to counter" as used in the ABM Treaty was intended to have the ordinary meaning of "blocking" or "stopping" a reentry vehicle. In the context of the ABM Treaty giving a SAM system "capabilities to counter strategic ballistic missiles" meant giving them actual ABM capabilities.

Since virtually any air defense missile system has some level of ABM capability, the Treaty was not intended to preclude an incidental or insignificant ABM capability, but rather a meaningful or significant capability. Such a determination must ultimately be a factual determination taking into account the military significance of whatever ABM capability is present.

The U.S. believes that a SAM would be tested in an ABM mode if, for example, while guided by a radar, it was flight tested against a target vehicle which has a flight trajectory with characteristics of a strategic ballistic missile flight trajectory.

The key Soviet SAM system of concern is the SA-X-12, although concerns have existed about other Soviet air-defense systems. The SA-X-12 can engage tactical ballistic missiles in flight. Such a system with Anti-Tactical Ballistic Missile (ATBM) capabilities could have many of the features one would expect to see designed into an ABM system, possibly giving it capabilities to intercept some types of strategic ballistic missile RVs. The SA-X-12 system is also mobile, further increasing our concerns.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges that the evidence of Soviet actions with respect to SAM upgrade is insufficient to assess compliance with the Soviet Union's obligations under the ABM Treaty. However, this and other ABM-related activities suggest that the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

5. RAPID RELOAD OF ABM LAUNCHERS

The ABM Treaty limits the number of deployed ABM interceptor launchers and deployed ABM missiles, but does not limit the number of interceptor missiles that both sides can build and stockpile. The capability of the 100 deployed ABM launchers permitted by the Treaty could therefore be increased by stocking more than one interceptor missile per launcher and providing each launcher with a reload capability. The Treaty prohibits the development, testing or deployment of "automatic or semi-automatic or other similar systems for rapid reload" of the permitted launchers.

The two categories of Soviet actions relevant here are discussed on the following page.

Reload and refire activity: Galosh

The test launchers for the Galosh ABM interceptor missiles, which are deployed around Moscow, are at the Sary Shagan Missile Test Range. Galosh interceptor missiles are loaded into above-ground launchers apparently using conventional equipment.

The Soviets demonstrated a reload and refire time for the Galosh of much less than a day.

Reload activity: A different ABM interceptor at Sary Shagan

The only known test launchers for the high acceleration interceptor missile, similar to the U.S. Sprint missile developed for the inactive Safeguard ABM system, are at Sary Shagan.

LIke the Galosh, the Soviets have demonstrated that a launcher for this missile can be reloaded in much less than a day.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges, on the basis of the evidence available, that the USSR's actions with respect to the rapid reload of ABM launchers constitute an ambiguous situation as concerns its legal obligations under the ABM Treaty not to develop systems for rapid reload. The Soviet Union's reload capabilities are a serious concern. These and other ABM-related Soviet activities suggest the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory.

6. ABM TERRITORIAL DEFENSE

The ABM Treaty includes the obligation ". . . not to deploy ABM systems for a defense of the territory of its country and not to provide a base for such a defense . . ." The prohibition on the defense of "the territory of its country" means a ban on the ABM defense of the Party's national territory, which is the central purpose of the Treaty, as distinct from defending a specifically allowed region, such as Moscow. While the size of the territory that must be defended to constitute a territorial defense was not defined, this is considered to mean a defense of all or a large portion of the country.

The Soviet Union has conducted a number of ABM activities, or activities that can be characterized as ABM-related. The totally of these activities has created concerns within the U.S. about Soviet deployment of a territorial ABM defense. These include:

The construction of several large phased-array radars, including the radar at Krasnoyarsk, which might constitute deployment of the major long lead-time components of a nationwide-ABM defense;

The apparent testing and development of components required for an ABM system which could be deployed to a site in months rather than years;

The numerous incidents of concurrent operations of air defense components and ABM components that indicate the probable testing of air defense components in an ABM mode;

The development of a modern air defense system, the SA-X-12, which may have some ABM capabilities; and

The demonstration of an ability to reload ABM launchers and to refire the interceptor missile in a period of time shorter than previously noted.

Soviet construction of new large phased-array radars (LPARs), which could support an ABM system by providing detection and tracking, and the illegal appearance of one of these radars—at Krasnoyarsk deep in the interior of the Soviet Union—increases concern about the Soviet Union's capability for ABM "break-out." Such large phased-array radars could constitute the production and deployment of long lead-time components of a nationwide defense. These Soviet LPARs are far more powerful and capable than U.S. ballistic missile early warning LPARs.

The apparent testing and development of the components required for an ABM system which could be deployed to a site in months rather than years could also contribute to ABM "breakout." In addition, the probable testing of air defense components in an ABM mode and the potential ABM capability of a modern surface-to-air missile system raises further concerns that the Soviet Union may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory. If Soviet air defense components were given ABM capabilities as a result of these activities, then such a development would provide another route for ABM "break-out." Soviet air defense components are rapidly deployable and their effectiveness could be enhanced by the inherent capabilities of LPARs.

Soviet deployment of an ABM territorial defense contrary to the ABM Treaty would have profound implications for Western security and the vital East-West strategic balance. A unilateral Soviet territorial ABM capability acquired in violation of the ABM Treaty could erode our deterrent and leave doubts about its credibility. Such capability might encourage the Soviets to take increased risks in crises, thus degrading crisis stability.

Finding

The U.S. Government judges that the aggregate of the Soviet Union's ABM and ABM-related actions (e.g., radar construction, concurrent testing, SAM upgrade, ABM rapid reload and ABM mobility) suggests that the USSR may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territories.

SALT II Treaty

The primary goal of the SALT II Agreement of 1979 was to replace the 1972 Interim Agreement with a long-term comprehensive treaty providing broad limits on strategic offensive weapons systems. The principal U.S. objectives were to provide for equal numbers of strategic nuclear delivery vehicles for the sides, to begin the process of reduction of these delivery vehicles, and to impose restraints on qualitative developments which could threaten future stability.

SALT II was signed in June 1979, but was withdrawn from Senate consideration following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and has not been ratified. In 1981, the United States made clear to the Soviet Union its intention not to ratify the SALT II Treaty. Prior to the formal clarification of the U.S. position in 1981, both nations were obligated under customary international law not to take actions which would defeat the object and purpose of the signed, but unratified, Treaty. Any such Soviet actions prior to 1981 are violations of legal obligations. Since 1981, the United States has observed a political commitment to refrain from actions that undercut the SALT II Treaty so long as the Soviet Union shows equal restraint. In 1982 the Soviets told us they would abide by the SALT II Treaty. Soviet actions inconsistent with this commitment are violations of their political commitment with respect to the SALT II Treaty.

Seven SALT II issues are included in this unclassified report: the testing and deployment of the SS-25 ICBM, strategic nuclear delivery vehicle limits, the deployment of the SS-16 ICBM, Backfire bomber intercontinental operating capability, Backfire bomber production rate, the encryption of telemetry, and the concealment of the association between an ICBM and its launcher.

1. SS-25 ICBM

In an attempt to constrain the modernization and proliferation of new, more capable types of ICBMs, the provisions of SALT II permit each side to "flight test and deploy" just one new type of "light" ICBM. A new type is defined as one that differs from an existing type by more than 5 percent in length, largest diameter, launch-weight, throw-weight, or differs in number of stages or propellant type (i.e., liquid or solid).

In addition, it was agreed that no ICBM of an existing type with a post-boost vehicle and a single reentry vehicle (RV) would be flight-tested or deployed whose reentry vehicle is less than 50 percent of the throw-weight of that ICBM. This provision was designed to limit the capability to break out of Treaty limits rapidly by quickly converting missiles with a single RV to missiles with multiple independently-targeted reentry vehicles (MIRV).

The SALT II Treaty permits each Party to use various methods of transmitting telemetric information during testing, including encryption, but bans deliberate denial of telemetry, such as through encryption, whenever such denial impedes verification.

The SS-25, a clear and irreversible violation of the Soviet Union's SALT II commitment, also has important political and military implications. Testing and deployment of this missile violates a central provision of the SALT II Treaty, which was intended to limit the number of new ICBM's

The Soviets have declared the SS-X-24, a large MIRVed solid propellant ICBM approximately the size of the U.S. MX ICBM, to be their allowed one "new type" ICBM. The Soviets have, in addition, flight tested and started to deploy the SS-25 ICBM, a small, solid propellant three-stage ICBM approxmately the size of the U.S. Minuteman ICBM. At least 45 mobile SS-25 have now been deployed.

The Soviets have falsely asserted that the SS-25 is an allowed modification of the SS-13 ICBM. The SS-25 has the same number of stages (three) and the same propellant type (solid) as the SS-13. However, analysis indicates that the throw-weights of the SS-25 and SS-13 differ by considerably more than the 5 percent allowed for modernized missiles.

The analysis also showed that the weight of the SS-25 RV is definitely less than 50 percent of the missile's throw-weight.

The SS-25 is mobile and could be made more lethal by modifying it to carry more than a single warhead. Most worrisome is the technical argument by which the Soviets sought to justify the SS-25, for it might be applied to additional prohibited new types of ICBMs in the future.

FINDINGS

Second new type—testing and deployment

The U.S. Government judges based on convincing evidence about the SS-25, that the throw-weight of the Soviet SS-25 exceeds by more than 5 percent the throw-weight of the Soviet SS-13 ICBM and cannot therefore be considered a permitted modernization of the SS-13 as the Soviets claim. The SS-25 is a prohibited second "new type" of ICBM and its testing, in addition to the testing of the SS-X-24 ICBM, thereby is a violation of the Soviet Union's political commitment to observe the "new type" provision of the SALT II Treaty. The deployment of this missile during 1985 constitutes a further violation of the SALT II prohibition on a second "new type" of ICBM.

RV-to-throw-weight ratio

The U.S. Government concludes that if we were to accept the Soviet argument that the SS-25 is not a prohibited "new type" of ICBM, it would be a violation of their political commitment to observe the SALT II provision which prohibits the testing of such an existing ICBM with a single reentry vehicle whose weight is less than 50 percent of the throw-weight of the ICBM.

Encryption

The U.S. Government judges that telemetry encryption during tests of the SS-25 is illustrative of the deliberate impeding of verification of compliance in violation of the USSR's political commitment.

Despite U.S. requests for explanations and corrective actions with regard to the SS-25 ICBM-related activities, Soviet actions continue unchanged, and the Soviet Union has proceeded to deployment of this missile.

2. STRATEGIC NUCLEAR DELIVERY VEHICLE LIMITS

Upon entry into force of the SALT II Treaty each Party was to undertake to limit the number of strategic nuclear delivery vehicles (SNDVs)—ICBM launchers, SLBM launchers, heavy bombers, and air-to-surface ballistic missiles—to an aggregate number not to exceed 2,400. Thereafter the aggregate was to be further reduced to 2,250 SNDVs. At the time of the signing of the SALT II Treaty the Soviet Union and the United States agreed in a Memorandum of Understanding that as of November 1, 1978 the Soviet Union's aggregate number of SNDVs was 2,504.

Since the Treaty has never entered into force, the Soviets have never been under an obligation to reduce their SNDVs to 2,400 from the 2,504 listed in the Memorandum of Understanding that is a part of SALT II, nor have they ever been obligated to the later reduction to 2,250 also scheduled by the Treaty.

The Soviet commitment to abide by SALT II brought with it a new standard for judging what actions must be undertaken with respect to SALT II. Under this commitment, the Treaty must be adhered to except for certain time-limited or specified provisions.

The logic of the U.S. and the USSR's agreement to "abide by" SALT II assumes that some numerical ceiling on SNDVs exists, even though there was no explicit agreement between the U.S. and the USSR on the numerical value of such a ceiling. In order to compensate for the introduction of new SNDVs into its inventory, the Soviet Union could remove existing SNDVs by dismantling or destroying them. They could do so by utilizing the SALT I Interim Agreement Protocol for ICBM's. In the case of heavy bombers, the Soviets may use the agreed portions of the draft SALT II Protocol for Dismantling or Destruction as an ad hoc guide.

The question at issue is whether any increase in SNDVs above 2,504 is consistent with the Soviet Union's political commitment to abide by the SALT II Treaty.

At the time SALT II was signed (June 1979) the Soviet Union had 2,504 SNDVs. When the U.S. informed the Soviets in September 1981 that it would not seek to ratify SALT II, we believe the Soviets had about the number of SNDVs it had in June 1979. Thus their action during this period appears consistent with their obligation. At the time they agreed to "abide by" the Treaty in 1982, the Soviets had a few more SNDVs than in June 1979.

The Soviet Union increased the number of SALT-accountable strategic nuclear delivery vehicles (SNDVs) in its arsenal from the 2,504 that it had as of June 18, 1979, when SALT II was signed, to more than 2,520 by the fall of 1984.

By December 31, 1984, additional SNDVs had become SALT accountable. Also, during the last several months of 1984 the Soviet Union destroyed a number of launchers of the SS-11 ICBM. We believe these launchers were destroyed to compensate for the deployment of the SS-25 ICBM; the destruction did not compensate for the production of new Bear H bombers that originally placed the SNDV aggregate over 2,504.

During 1985, the Soviets continued to deploy SS-25's and destroy old SS-11 launchers. In addition, more new Bear H cruise missile-carrying bombers were deployed and some older heavy bombers were destroyed. The net effect of these Soviet actions was to maintain their SNDV count at a level above the 2,504 allowed. While the SNDV aggregate varied from near 2,504 to approximately 2,540 during the last year, on November 30, 1985 (the cutoff date for this report) the best U.S. estimate of Soviet SNDV's was approximately 2,520.

The Preamble and Article I of the SALT II Treaty make clear that the fundamental objective of the Treaty is to place limits on strategic offensive arms. Article III places such limits on SNDV's and, when the Soviet Union made its political commitment to abide by SALT II, it committed itself not to act inconsistently with the fundamental objective of the Treaty.

FINDING

The U.S. Government interprets the Soviet commitment to abide by SALT II as including the existence of a cap on SNDVs—at the level of 2,504 existing at the time SALT II was signed (June 1979). The Soviet Union has deployed SNDV's above the 2,504 cap in violation of its political commitment under SALT II. Such activity is indicative of a Soviet policy inconsistent with this political commitment.

3. SS-16 ICBM deployment

During the negotiation of the SALT II Treaty, there was concern that land-based launchers for ballistic missiles which were not considered strategic missiles and, therefore, were not limited by the Treaty, could be converted into launchers for the strategic missiles which were limited.

Between 1972 and 1976, the Soviet Union flight-tested the SS-16, a three-stage, solid-propellant, single-RV ICBM from the Plesetsk Missile Test Center in the USSR. The SS-16 missile is closely related to the SS-20, an intermediate range ballistic missile (IRBM). The U.S. was concerned that the SS-20, which was unconstrained by the SALT II Treaty, could be converted from an IRBM to an ICBM with a range of 5,500 KM or more. Distinguishing between SS-16 and SS-20 deployments would thus be very difficult. To preclude this situation from arising, the U.S. is negotiating the SALT II Treaty, obtained agreement from the Soviets not to produce, test, or deploy ICBMs of the SS-16 type. Further the Soviets agreed not to produce the SS-16's third stage, reentry vehicle or "other appropriate device" (post-boost vehicle) for targeting the missile's single reentry vehicle.

In assessing whether the SS-16 is deployed at Plesetsk, we have focused on the question of whether it can be established that the SS-16 ICBM has been maintained in a functioning state and thus could be made ready for launch in a short period of time. During the 1976-1978 time period, after SS-16 flight tests had been discontinued, modification and expansion of mobile missile facilities at sites historically associated with the SS-16 at Plesetsk were conducted by the Soviet Union. Subsequent to this, we have observed activity at these sites suggesting SS-16 deployment. That activity was extensively analyzed. As a result of this analysis we conclude that the Soviets probably deployed SS-16 missiles at Plesetsk until 1985.

Soviet activity at Plesetsk during 1985 would seem to indicate that SS-16s present there were probably removed. In places previously associated with the SS-16, there is some evidence that equipment associated with a different ICBM has been introduced.

FINDING

While the evidence is somewhat ambiguous and we cannot reach a definitive conclusion, the U.S. Government found the activities at Plesetsk to be a probable violation of the USSR's legal obligation and political commitment under SALT II. Soviet activity in the past year seems to indicate the probable removal of SS-16 equipment and introduction of equipment associated with a different ICBM.

4. Backfire bomber intercontinental operating capability

At the signing of SALT II, the USSR gave the U.S. assurances about the Backfire bomber's intercontinental operating capability. The Soviet statement of June 16, 1979 read, in pertinent part, as follows: "The Soviet side informs the U.S. side that the Soviet "Tu-22M" airplane, called 'Backfire' in the USA, is a medium-range bomber, and that it does not intend to give this airplane the capability of operating at intercontinental distances. In this connection, the Soviet side states that it will not increase the radius of action of this airplane in such a way as to enable it to strike targets on the territory of the USA. Nor does it intend to give it such a capability in any other manner, including by inflight refueling. . . ."

This Soviet statement is an integral part of the SALT II agreement and the U.S. considers it to be incorporated in the Soviet Union's political commitment to abide by SALT II.

During the Senate ratification hearings (August 15, 1979) on the Treaty, it was stated that "Similarly, other changes in current Backfire practices such as deployment of a tanker force for the Backfire or regular use of Long-Range Aviation Arctic staging bases, would call into question the Soviet statement on giving the Backfire a capability against the United States."

Prior to the signing of SALT II, Soviet Backfire bombers deployed to Arctic bases a number of times. In recent years Soviet Backfire aircraft again deployed to military bases in the Arctic. They remained there for several days and later departed.

The U.S. view of the Soviet commitment not to give the Backfire an intercontinental capacity against the U.S. includes Soviet foregoing of the movement of Backfire bombers to Arctic staging bases within range of the U.S. when such staging could be construed as training for operational use of such bases. If so staged, such bombers, under certain conditions, could attack some areas in the U.S. even without aerial refueling.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that the temporary deployment of Backfire's to Arctic bases is cause for concern and continued careful monitoring. By such temporary deployment of Backfire's, the Soviet Union acted in a manner inconsistent with its political commitment in the June 1979 Backfire statement not to give Backfire the capability to strike targets on the territory of the United States.

5. Backfire production rate

The U.S. was willing to exempt the Backfire from SALT II restraints only if the USSR were to agree to place certain restrictions on the production, use and deployment of the Backfire bomber.

The Soviet Union, in a unilateral statement which is appended to the SALT II Treaty, specifically stated "that it will not increase the production rate of this airplane as compared to the present rate." Secretary Vance's June 21, 1979, "Letter of Submittal" to the Senate states further that "President Brezhnev confirmed that the Soviet Backfire production rate would not exceed 30 per year."

These Soviet statements are viewed as binding the Soviets not to increase the production rate of the Backfire compared to the production rate in 1979 and to be a part of the Soviet political commitment to abide by SALT II.

Our estimates of annual production are based on an examination of all data and consideration of the entire Backfire production run, not solely on the information available during any given year.

We believe the data indicate an essentially constant production rate at slightly more than 30 aircraft per year through the end of 1983. Since that time the annual Backfire production rate appears to have decreased to slightly less than 30 aircraft per year.

The compliance question with respect to Backfire production is then, primarily a question of fact, not obligation. Have the Soviets increased the production rate of the Backfire compared to the rate of time SALT II was signed, and have they produced more than 30 Backfire's per year since signing SALT II?

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that the Soviet Union is obligated to produce no more than 30 Backfire bomber aircraft per year. There are ambiguities concerning the data. However, there is evidence that the Soviet Backfire production was constant at slightly more than 30 per year until 1984, and decreased since that time to slightly below 30 per year.

6. Encryption of ballistic missile telemetry

The SALT II Treaty prohibits deliberate concealment measures that impede verification of adherence to the treaty provisions by national technical means. While the Treaty permits each party to use various methods of transmitting telemetric information during testing, including encryption, the deliberate denial of telemetric information, whenever such denial impedes verification of compliance with the provisions of the Treaty, is specifically prohibited by the SALT II Treaty.

The Soviets have been heavily encrypting telemetry broadcasts during tests of strategic ballistic missiles, thereby impeding U.S. verification of compliance with the SALT II Treaty.

Since the SALT I agreement in 1972, Soviet encryption and concealment activities have become more extensive and disturbing. These activities, Soviet responses on these issues, and Soviet failure to take the corrective actions which the United States has repeatedly requested, are indicative of a Soviet attitude contrary to the fundamentals of sound arms control agreements. Soviet encryption and concealment activities present special obstacles to maintaining existing arms control agreements, undermine the political confidence necessary for concluding new treaties, and underscore the necessity that any new agreement be effectively verifiable. Soviet noncompliance, as documented in current and past Administration reports and exemplified by the encryption and concealment issues, has made verification and compliance pacing elements of arms control today.

FINDING

The U.S. Government concludes that Soviet encryption practices constitute a violation of a legal obligation under SALT II prior to 1981 and a violation of their political commitment since 1982. The nature and extent of such encryption of telemetry on new ballistic missiles, despite U.S. requests for corrective action, continues to be an example of deliberately impeding verification of compliance in violation of this Soviet political commitment.

7. Concealment of Missile/Launcher Association

Article XV of the SALT II Treaty prohibits "deliberate concealment measures which impede verification by national technical means of compliance with the provisions of this Treaty." This obligation is further clarified in a Common Understanding that states that Article XV applies to all provisions of the Treaty and "includes the obligation not to use deliberate concealment measures associated with testing, including those measures aimed at concealing the association between ICBMs and launchers during testing."

The commentary of Secretary of State Cyrus Vance on this provision of the SALT II Treaty provides, as examples of deliberate concealment measures, "camouflage, decoys, or encryption of telemetry . . ." The Vance analysis states:

Also the Common Understanding notes that the prohibition includes measures intended to conceal the association between ICBM's and their launchers during testing. For example, this would prohibit the kinds of covered facilities employed at a Soviet test range several years ago which impeded our ability to associate the SS-16 ICBM with its launcher.

In order to determine the relationship between ICBM's and their launchers, it is necessary to observe the ICBM or its canister, and its launcher, and to determine whether or not these are "associated" (e.g., whether the launcher can launch and has launched the missile). This is necessary because under the Treaty a launcher becomes accountable as a MIRVed or non-MIRVed launcher based upon the type of missile it has launched. Thus, there is a requirement under the Treaty to distinguish between MIRVed and non-MIRVed ICBM launchers. In order to count launchers it is necessary to identify them and differentiate them from launchers of missiles that are not limited by the Treaty—IRBM launchers, for example. This again creates a requirement that the launcher be observed during the testing period and that it be verified that that particular type of launcher actually launched a specific ballistic missile.

A statement by the Soviet Government that the SS-25 has a mobile launcher is not sufficient to relieve the Soviet Union of the obligation not to impede the verification of the relationship of an ICBM to its launcher. Soviet actions with respect to the SS-25 clearly have had that effect. They represent deliberate concealment activities, the object of which is to deny association of the missile and its launcher by the denial of the observation of both.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges Soviet activities related to the SS-25 to be a violation of the Soviet Union's political commitment to abide by the SALT II Treaty provision prohibiting concealment of the association between a missile and its launcher during testing.

SALT I INTERIM AGREEMENT

The SALT I Interim Agreement on the Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms entered into force between the United States and the Soviet Union in 1972. Dismantling procedures implementing the Interim Agreement were concluded in 1974. The Interim Agreement were concluded in 1974. The Interim Agreement, by its own terms, was of limited duration and expired as a legally binding document in 1977. The applicability of the Interim Agreement to the actions of both Parties has, however, been extended through a series of mutual political commitments, including the President's May 31, 1982 statement, that the United States would refrain from actions which would undercut existing strategic arms agreements so long as the Soviet Union shows equal restraint. The President stated, in his June 10, 1985 message to Congress "that the United States will continue to refrain from undercutting existing strategic arms agreements to the extent that the Soviet Union exercises comparable restraint and provided that the Soviet Union actively pursues arms reduction agreements in the currently ongoing nuclear and space talks in Geneva." The Soviets have told us that they would abide by the SALT I Interim Agreement and SALT II. Any actions by the USSR inconsistent with this commitment are violations of its political commitment with respect to the Interim Agreement and its implementing procedures.

USE OF "REMAINING FACILITIES" AT FORMER SS-7 SITES

The SALT I Interim Agreement and its procedures prohibit the Parties from using for the storage, support, or launch of ICBM's certain facilities remaining at dismantled or destroyed ICBM sites (such as SS-7 ICBM sites). The prohibitions were devised to prevent the rapid reactivation of such sites.

The Soviets deactivated their SS-7 ICBM sites in the 1970s in compensation for new systems introduced. The launch facilities were destroyed in accordance with the prescribed procedures. However, a number of missile support facilities were left standing.

Thus, according to the SALT I Interim agreement and its procedures, there are two major criteria for determining whether the use of the structures remaining at the former SS-7 sites would be a violation. The particular structure must meet the definition of a facility whose use for storage, support or launch of ICBM's is prohibited.

The use of remaining facilities in violation of its political commitment to abide by the Interim Agreement would save the Soviet Union the cost of building additional facilities of the same or similar type to support the SS-25.

Construction activity during 1984 and 1985 at some of the former SS-7 sites gave cause for concern that the Soviet Union might incorporate remaining facilities into the operations area for the new SS-25 ICBM. Evidence obtained during 1985 at some of these sites involving deployment of the SS-25 indicates that remaining facilities are used to support deployment and operation of the new Soviet ICBM, the SS-25, which is itself also a violation of Soviet political commitments.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that Soviet use of former SS-7 ICBM facilities in support of the deployment and operation of the SS-25 mobile ICBM's is in violation of the SALT I Interim Agreement. Should the Soviets use "remaining facilities" in the future at other former SS-7 sites where the SS-25 is now in the process of being deployed, such use will also constitute Soviet violation of its political commitment under the SALT I interim Agreement.

BIOLOGICAL AND TOXIN WEAPONS CONVENTION AND 1925 GENEVA PROTOCOL

The 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (the BWC) and the 1925 Generva Protocol are multilateral treaties to which both the United States and the Soviet Union are parties. Soviet actions not in accord with these treaties and customary international law relating to the 1925 Geneva Protocol are violations of legal obligations.

The Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BWC) (1972) requires each State party never to develop, produce, stockpile or otherwise acquire or retain (1) microbial or other biological agents or toxins of types and in quantities that have no justification for prophylactic, protective or other peaceful purposes; or (2) weapons, equipment or means of delivery designed to use such agents or toxins for hostile purposes or in armed conflict. It further obligate each Party not to transfer to any recipent, and not to assist, encourage or induce any State, group of States or international organizations to manufacture or otherwise acquire such agents, toxins, weapons, equipment or means of delivery.

The Geneva Protocol (1925) prohibits "the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials or devices. . . ." It also prohibits "the use of bacteriological methods of warfare."

The BWC contains no obligation to declare possession or destruction of prohibited agents and equipment but only to destroy or divert them to peaceful purposes within nine months of entry into force of the Convention. The Soviets never formally acknowledged possession or destruction of prohibited items. They have stated only that they are in compliance with the provisions of the BWC.

The U.S. has formally presented its case regarding Soviet involvement in provision and use of toxin weapons in two unclassified reports to the UN and to the public (Department of State Special Report 98 of March 1982, and Special Report 104 of November 1982). These reports presented a comprehensive summary of the information, evidence, and an analysis of results the U.S. had obtained on the use of toxins and other chemical warfare agents by the Soviets in Afghanistan and by the Lao and Vietnamese, under Soviet supervision in Laos and Kampuchea.

The evidence included refugee report and the identification of the toxin in victims' blood and in samples from attack sites but not in control samples from either people or areas not subjected to a toxic attack. There are also refugee accounts of Soviet technicians supervising the shipment, storage, filling, and loading onto aircraft of the toxin munitions in Southeast Asia. The first physical evidence of direct Soviet use of toxin weapons in Afghanistan resulted from analysis of a contaminated Soviet gas mask acquired from Afghanistan in 1981. In August 1983 the U.S. submitted to the UN further evidence of toxin use as revealed in chemical analysis of blood taken from victims of "yellow rain" attacks. The U.S. submission to the UN in February 1984 summarized preliminary findings for 1983 regarding the use of chemical and toxin agents in Asia.

The Soviets responded with a "scientific paper" presented to the UN, which has undertaken an investigation of the charges of use of lethal chemical and toxins in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan. The Soviets contended that Fusaria spores originated from natural contamination of the elephant grass in Vietnam caused by U.S. use of Agent Orange, and that these spores were carried by prevailing winds into Kampuchea and Laos, causing natural contamination of the environment and subsequent illness among alleged victims. This Soviet explanation is not plausible.

Explanations of the presence of toxins in Southeast Asia as natural contamination of pollen-laden bee feces or other naturally occurring phenomena are not supported by the accumulated intelligence data and scientific scrutiny. These alternative hypotheses do not, for example, take into account a large body of other evidence, including eyewitness reports of planes releasing clouds of agents and of artillery bombardment with agent-filled shells that produced trichothecene symptoms, and the findings of toxin in samples not containing pollen. Also, the occurrences of "yellow rain" have been limited to war zones; if natural occurrence theories were correct, other people throughout the region would be affected. No such phenomenon has been observed.

In addition to evidence concerning chemical and toxin weapon use, we have much evidence of the continuation of an aggressive biological weapons production and development program by the Soviet Union. The apparently accidental release of anthrax from a Soviet biological warfare facility in Sverdlovsk in 1979 probably resulting in the deaths of several hundred people is a reminder of the danger of this program. The Soviets have apparently also engaged in research on advanced genetically engineered biological agents.

During 1985, we have been unable to confirm any lethal chemical and toxin attacks in Kampuchea, Laos or Afghanistan according to our established standards of evidence (i.e., two or more corroborating reports from different sources). However, there were a number of reports, although diminished in number, of chemical attacks. These reported nonlethal agents have not yet been identified.

Chemical, biological and toxin weapons have major military implications. The effect of comparatively primitive chemical weapons was demonstrated as early as World War I, when there were 90,000 deaths and 1,000,000 casualties from chemical weapons.

The Soviet Union has a prohibited offensive biological warfare capability which we do not have and against which we have no defense. This capability may include advanced biological agents about which we have little knowledge. Evidence suggests that the Soviets are expanding their chemical and toxin warfare capabilities in a manner that has no parallel in NATO's retaliatory or defensive program.

FINDING

The U.S. government judges that ongoing Soviet activities confirm and strengthen the conclusion that the Soviet Union has maintained an offensive biological warfare program and capability in violation of its legal obligation under the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention of 1972.

Allegations concerning the use of lethal chemicals or toxins in Kampuchea, Laos, or Afghanistan have subsided in 1985. However, prior to this time, the Soviet Union was involved in the production, transfer and use of trichothecene mycotoxins for hostile purposes in Laos, Kampuchea and Afghanisan in violation of its legal obligation under international law as codified in the Geneva Protocol of 1925 and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention of 1972.

LIMITED TEST BAN TREATY

The Treaty Banning Nuclear Weapon Tests in the Atmosphere, in Outer Space and Under Water (Limited Test Ban Treaty (LTBT)) is a multilateral treaty that entered into force for the United States and the Soviet Union in 1963. Soviet actions not in accord with this Treaty are violations of a legal obligation.

UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TEST VENTING

The Limited Test Ban Treaty of 1963 (LTBT) prohibits nuclear weapons tests "or any other nuclear explosion" in the atmosphere, in outer space and under water. While not banning tests underground, the Treaty does prohibit nuclear explosions that cause "radioactive debris to be present outside the territorial limits of the State under whose jurisdiction or control" the explosions were conducted.

During hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee prior to ratification of the Treaty, Dr. Seaborg, then Chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission (AEC), stated that "the Treaty would prohibit a test which resulted in a quantity of radioactive debris delivered outside of the country's territorial limits in amounts sufficient to establish that such contamination resulted from a recent test within that country."

Since late 1963, many Soviet underground nuclear tests have been detected by the U.S. On numerous occasions the U.S. collected, outside the territorial limits of the USSR, atmospheric samples of radioactive matter unambiguously associated with some of these Soviet nuclear tests.

Soviet test practices are apparently designed to minimize the cost of testing at the price of radioactive release into the atmosphere in many Soviet tests.

There is no unambiguous evidence of instances of venting associated with Soviet nuclear testing in 1985.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that the Soviet Union's underground nuclear test practices have resulted in the venting of radioactive matter on numerous occasions and caused radioactive matter to be present outside the Soviet Union's territorial limits in violation of its legal obligation to the Limited Test Ban Treaty. The Soviet Union has failed to take the precautions necessary to minimize the contamination of man's environment by radioactive substances despite U.S. demarches and request for corrective action.

THRESHOLD TEST BAN TREATY

NUCLEAR TESTING AND THE 150-KILOTON LIMIT

The Treaty on the Limitation of Underground Nuclear Weapon Tests, referred to as the Threshold Test Ban Treaty (TTBT) prohibits underground explosions with yields exceeding 150 kilotons (kt). The intent of the TTBT was to reduce significantly the explosive force of the new nuclear warheads and bombs that could otherwise be tested for weapon systems. The TTBT was signed in July 1974.

The TTBT is a treaty signed by the negotiating Parties but ratified by neither. However, neither Party has made its intentions clear not to become a Party. As such, both signatories are subject to the obligation to refrain from acts which would defeat the object and purpose of the TTBT. A single test which intentionally exceeded 150 kt could defeat the object and purpose of the TTBT. In 1976 the signatories each separately announced their intention to observe the TTBT limit.

Between 1976 and December 1985, the Soviets conducted about 190 underground nuclear explosions. The seismic data from each of these explosions has been carefully examined. The seismic data from the totality of explosions has been subjected to statistical analysis. Additional information relevant to the assessment of the Soviet nuclear test program has been analyzed. While there remains uncertainty with regard to the actual yields of Soviet nuclear devices tested, the estimated yield has exceeded 150 kt in a number of instances.

The TTBT states that compliance with it will be verified by national technical means. National technical means include but are not limited to seismometers. The Protocol to the Treaty requires, upon ratification by both Parties, an exchange of geological information on the designated nuclear test areas and explosion calibration information, including yields, for each of these areas. There are no provisions for verifying the accuracy of the data to be provided by each Party. The U.S. has repeatedly proposed discussions on verification improvements that might ultimately lead to effective verification but the Soviet Union has thus far rejected all such U.S. efforts.

Soviet testing at yields above the 150 kiloton limit would allow development of advanced nuclear weapons with proportionately higher yields than the yields of weapons that the U.S. could develop under the Treaty. Such higher-yield weapons would be suitable for Soviet counterforce weapons that are believed to be mounted on Soviet ICBMs.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that, while ambiguities in the pattern of Soviet testing and verification uncertainties continued in 1985, Soviet nuclear testing activities for a number of tests constitute a likely violation of legal obligations under the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974, which banned underground nuclear tests with yields exceeding 150 kilotons. These Soviet actions continue despite U.S. requests for corrective measures.

HELSINKI FINAL ACT

The Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe was signed in Helsinki in 1975. This document represents a political commitment and was signed by the United States and the Soviet Union, along with many other States. Soviet actions not in accord with that document are violations of their political commitment.

EXERCISE NOTIFICATION PROVISIONS OF THE HELSINKI FINAL ACT

The signatories to the Helsinki Final Act of 1975 are required by the Act's "Documents on Confidence-Building Measures (CBMs) and Certain Aspects of Security and Disarmament" to give prior notification to other participating States "of major military maneuvers exceeding a total of 25,000 troops, independently or combined with any possible air or naval components." The notification "will contain information of the designation, if any, the general purpose of and the States involved in the maneuver, the type or types and numerical strength of the forces engaged, the area and estimated time frame of its conduct. The participating States will also, if possible, provide additional relevant information, particularly that related to the components of the forces engaged and the period of involvement of these forces." The participating States will invite other participating States voluntarily and on a bilateral basis, to send observers to attend military maneuvers.

The Soviet Union's August 14 notification of the September 4–12, 1981 maneuver "ZAPAD–81" did not include the maneuver's designation, nor did it provide the types of forces engaged, and most importantly, it did not include the number of troops taking part. "ZAPAD–81" may have been the largest maneuver conducted by any signatory State, or group of signatory States, since the Final Act was adopted.

The United States asked the Soviet Union, through diplomatic channels, about its preparations for "ZAPAD–81" prior to the beginning of the maneuver. No further information was given by the Soviet Union until September 5, the second day of the maneuver, when the Soviet news agency TASS reported the name of the maneuver and the fact that approximately 100,000 troops were taking part.

The information in the notifications issued by eastern States has normally been limited to the bare minimum of information required by the Final Act. Little, if any, additional relevant information, relating to the components of the forces engaged and the period of engagement, has been provided. The eastern countries have invited observers to fewer than half of their major maneuvers and have frequently been unwilling to allow the observers adequate observation of the exercises.

FINDING

The U.S. Government judges that the Soviet Union in 1981 violated its political commitment to observe provisions of Basket I of the Helsinki Final Act by not providing notification of exercise "ZAPAD–81." While the USSR has generally taken an approach to the confidence-building measures of the Final Act which minimizes the information it provides, Soviet compliance with the exercise notification provisions was improved in 1983. In 1984, the USSR returned to a minimalist approach providing only the bare information required under the Final Act. The Soviet Union continued this approach during 1985.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an article in the Washington Post of March 10, 1986, by Rowland Evans and Robert Novak entitled "ABM: A New Soviet Violation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit No. 1.)

Mr. HELMS. Now, Mr. President, let me offer a few comments about these two documents.

First, Dr. Kenneth Adelman, Director of ACDA, states in his "Forward to Soviet Noncompliance":

The Soviets have adhered to many if not most provisions of the treaties to which they are a Party.

With all due respect to Kenneth Adelman, who is a friend of mine, and known well by most, if not all, of the Members of the Senate, I am bound to say to them that this assertion is not supported by a careful analysis of the provisions of all the arms control treaties to which the Soviets are a party, especially when the provisions which are actually operationally constraining are considered. I am working on a study which will demonstrate this situation in detail, and I will report to this body when it is completed. For example, the Soviets are violating most of the operationally constraining provisions of the SALT I ABM Treaty, and certainly the most important of the ABM Treaty's provisions. Likewise, the Soviets are violating the most significant provisions of the SALT II Treaty, and the SALT I interim agreement. I will supply the exact statistics in the forthcoming report to which I just alluded.

Second, the ACDA white paper reveals an expanding pattern of Soviet arms control treaty violations. This confirms Soviet SALT breakout. The original report of President Reagan to Congress on Soviet SALT violations, dated January 23, 1984, revealed only seven Soviet violations. There have been three more Presidential reports to Congress on Soviet SALT violations since January 23, 1984: October 10, 1984; February 1985; and December 23, 1985. Each of these reports added more Soviet SALT violations.

Mr. President, the ACDA white paper now lists 18 Soviet arms control treaty violations. A more complete listing of administration confirmed Soviet arms control violations would show 38 to 50 Soviet violations, depending upon the categories used. And previous official U.S. Government reports of 1955, 1959, 1962, and 1964 listed 150 Soviet violations of international security treaties. So there are a total of over 200 Soviet violations of international security treaties.

Third, the ACDA white paper disproves the Joint Chiefs of Staff fiscal year 1987 military posture statement on the number of SALT II-accountable Soviet strategic nuclear delivery vehicles. The Joint Chief of Staff as of January 1, 1986, listed 2,477 Soviet SNDV's as SALT II-accountable. The ACDA white paper shows dated February 1, 1986, that the "best U.S. estimate" of Soviet SNDV's, is about 2,520. Since the Soviets are only allowed 2,504 under SALT II, the Soviets are at least 16 SNDV's over the ceilings. In fact, they are reportedly 36 to 45 to 80 to 378 SNDV's over the SALT II ceiling, depending on which categories of weapons are counted.

Fourth, the reported Soviet removal of mobile SS-16 ICBM's from Plesetsk should offer us no comfort. It confirms that they were illegally deployed at this test range in the first place. And a new, different ICBM is now being deployed at Plesetsk in place of the mobile SS-16—reportedly the mobile SS-25 ICBM, which is covertly MIRV capable. Finally, while the mobile SS-16's from Plesetsk may have disappeared, they may be covertly deployed elsewhere, perhaps with the similar SS-20 mobile IRBM.

Fifth, the Evans and Novak column is deeply disturbing. These columnists, who were the first to reveal the Soviet Krasnoyarsk ABM radar violation, have now revealed an even more serious Soviet ABM Treaty violation—a nationwide, territorial ABM defense completely banned by the ABM Treaty. Moreover, the development of an ABM capability for the SAM 5, a development which has been underway for two decades, more than triples the number of Soviet ABM interceptors around Moscow, another ABM Treaty violation.

Mr. President, the Soviets now have the following series of Nationwide ABM System components in mass production: SAM-5 missiles and radars; SAM-10 missiles and radars; SAM-12 missiles and radars; and ABM-3 missiles and radars, according to recent testimony to the Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee by SDI Director General Abrahamson. All of these comprise a nationwide system of ABM missiles and radars, according to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Moreover, this new evidence confirms the testimony of Defense Secretary Weinberger last October 31, 1985, to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when he said that the Soviets already had an illegal "nationwide, territorial ABM defense."

Indeed, two Soviet officials have actually admitted this in private to American citizens. It is not surprising that General Abrahamson agreed that the Soviet deployment of these elements constituted a nationwide ABM defense in his recent testimony. Finally, it should be noted that, President Reagan stated on June 10, 1985 that "Soviet preparations for a prohibited territorial ABM defense * * * would have profound implications for the * * * East-West balance."

In sum, the expanding pattern of Soviet SALT violations confirms that the Soviets continue the pattern of breaking out of all the SALT treaties. I first made this argument on the Senate floor on September 23, 1983, and the evidence continues to accumulate.

Mr. President, the time has come for the Senate to take this issue seriously.

ABM: A NEW SOVIET VIOLATION

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

Top-secret intelligence that the Soviet Union has "calibrated" its air-defense radars with ABM radars, a flagrant treaty violation, is further souring the Reagan administration on the desirability of new nuclear treaties with Moscow.

Quite apart from private top-level skepticism about the efficacy of SALT agreements, alarm is growing that a Soviet territorial defense against strategic missile attack may be nearer realization than seemed possible only a year ago. Such a defense would violate the antiballistic missile (ABM) treaty of 1972. It could make the Soviet Union the paramount power, transforming superpower relations.

Ominous Soviet passage toward protection against possible American retaliation for a first-strike attack is killing what little zest the administration has had for new nuclear agreements. That presages a Geneva follow-on summit, tentatively set for this summer, that will produce nothing in the way of new arms treaties, leaving the United States free to pursue its own nuclear defenses—the futuristic SDI for the 21st century.

Arms control skeptics are angling for just such a non-result. This is not rejection of nuclear treaties to prevent a return of détente. Far from it. The mood is fear: no matter how skillfully U.S. negotiators attempt to close noncompliance escape hatches, ways to cheat will be found and exercised by Moscow.

The new evidence, acquired by the electronic miracles of U.S. satellites, appears to be definitive. A relatively old "Square Pair" radar for the SA-5 antiaircraft missile has been "calibrated" with a giant ABM-3 battle-management radar, the two having been moved next to each other in the vicinity of Moscow. The larger ABM radar appears designed to zero in on the incoming missile, then turn it over to SA-5, which fires its own missiles into the target.

This marriage between the two dissimilar radars, called "inter-netting," may well be the clinching evidence that the Soviets are preparing the SA-5 radar-interceptor for an active ABM role—forbidden by treaty. The significance goes far because the United States estimates there are no fewer than 2,500 SAM-5s in the Soviet Union. They are concentrated in four areas: the Moscow-Leningrad salient, the Caucasus, the Far East and the populated area of Siberia (near the Krasnoyarsk ABM radar, which the United States claims is a treaty violation). The 1972 treaty gave each side the right to defend its capital with a missile defense system—but only the capital.

SALT violations were routinely minimized by pre-Reagan administrations. Indeed, the arms control "process," which produced SALT and ABM treaties, made a comeback in the year leading up to the Geneva summit. But since the summit, the Soviet proposal to rid the world of all nuclear weapons has struck the Reagan White House as a propaganda trumpet, not a serious arms control proposal.

But the true measure of the administration's growing concern about any new treaty is not current negotiating problems in the Geneva arms talks (recessed last week at a standstill). The real source of concern is that no new agreement would be worth any more than the depreciating value of existing treaties.

In his white paper of Soviet violations, made public this weekend after being held up by the State Department for five weeks, arms control director Kenneth Adelman said that continuing Soviet violations "cannot help but have an impact upon our long-term security" and "jeopardize the process" of arms control. Privately, Adelman has warned in the highest administration councils about the dangers of new agreements.

In Brussels this week, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger raises the alarm further. He will inform NATO defense ministers that "taken together, all of the ABM and ABM-related activities" suggest preparations by the Soviets "to deploy rapidly" a territorial ABM defense.

Those words, written before Weinberger and his men were aware of the new intelligence on those 2,500 SAM-5s, hint that without revolutionary upgrading in verification procedures, no new treaty is worth having.

THE RETURN OF HERBLOCK

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Washington is a happier place to live these days: Spring is in the air and Herblock is in the Washington Post again.

Herbert L. Block, the Post's inestimable cartoonist, was missing and missed these past 3 months. He took this time off to undergo—and recover from—quadruple heart bypass surgery. How fitting, then, that on March 13 last, in his first cartoon since going under the knife, he wielded a saber on mismanagement in the Pentagon.

By all accounts, Herblock is back in fine physical form. Readers of the Post's editorial page these recent days have no doubt he is back in fine satirical form.

Mr. President, a necessary touch of gaiety has returned to Washington. I am sure all my colleagues will join me in welcoming Herblock back to his rightful place. We wish him well, and hope that the only surgery associated with him henceforth is that which he performs on his subjects.

U.S.-U.N. CONTRIBUTION

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to note that, as our European allies pointed out in a recent letter to Secretary of State George Shultz, the pending cutbacks in U.S. contributions to the United Nations carry some serious risks.

These cutbacks could put the United States in violation of charter obligations. With the reductions mandated under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and the Kassebaum amendment, the United States will cut its contributions to the United Nations by over $70 million this year, and fall well short of the contribution assessed by the United Nations.

Secretary Shultz states that these pending cutbacks provide a useful tool for winning budgetary and voting reforms in the United Nations and he is not wrong. He has called the current U.N. budget system "taxation without representation," because even though the United States contributes far more than the 78 poorest members of the United Nations, all members have an equal vote in determining how money is spent.

But weighting the power to vote according to size or ability to pay is not always appropriate. Under principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States, New York and Wyoming each have the same two votes in the Senate, even though New York has 47 times as great a population. In the U.N. General Assembly, voting is based on the established principle of sovereign equality between states.

Of course, the United States should continue pressing the United Nations to control its budget more effectively. However, by cutting back unilaterally on our contributions to that organization, and violating our obligations to it, our influence and ability to press for change would be jeopardized rather than enhanced. Our European allies recognize this danger.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the March 18, 1986, article concerning their letter to Secretary Shultz be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALLIES IN U.N. PROTEST ON BUDGET

(By Elaine Sciolino)

United Nations, N.Y., March 17.—The Western Europeans have told the United States that it would violate its treaty obligations by reducing its share of the United Nations budget.

The complaint, presented Friday in a letter on behalf of the 12 members of the Common Market, was addressed to Secretary of State George P. Shultz after representatives of the European group—the Ambassadors of the Netherlands, Luxembourg and Britain—had been unable for three weeks to get an appointment to see him. A supplementary note expressed regret that Mr. Shultz had not met with them and contained a new request for a meeting.

The Netherlands holds the chairmanship of the Common Market. Luxembourg is the former chairman, and Britain will be the chairman next year.

In Washington, Charles E. Redman, a State Department spokesman, acknowledged that the letter had been received, and he said the State Department had offered the Europeans a meeting with John C. Whitehead, the Deputy Secretary of State.

The letter, made available by European delegates, said: "The 12 wish to express their concern that recently enacted U.S. legislation, in particular the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act and the Kassebaum amendment, is significantly affecting the Administration's ability to comply with its international treaty obligations."

The legislation "will result in the United States' not fully meeting its financial obligation to the United Nations," the letter said. Contributions are calculated according to each member country's gross national product.

The United States, whose share is $210 million, or 25 percent of the United Nations budget, has said that it will cut its share by $70 million this year.

The cuts are mandated under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law, which imposes overall budget cuts to reduce the deficit, and under the Kassebaum amendment, which requires a 20 percent reduction in the United States contribution to the United Nations if largest contributors do not get more control over budget matters by Oct. 1.

The European letter said the 12 nations, which pay 30 percent of the budget, would not increase their shares to compensate for the American cuts.

Mr. Shultz has called the United Nations budget system "taxation without representation" because the United States has the same vote in determining where the United Nations' money goes as do the 78 poorest members.

SENATOR JIM SASSER ON UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD NICARAGUA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this past Sunday evening, March 16, 1986, President Reagan addressed the Nation on the subject of United States policy toward Nicaragua. The distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER, delivered the Democratic response to the President immediately thereafter. I believe Mr. SASSER delivered a reasoned, cogent, and very persuasive alternative to the program outlined by the President. I congratulate Mr. SASSER on his presentation and compliment him on his leadership on this very important issue for our Nation.

Mr. SASSER has developed, in close consultation with many Senators on both sides of the aisle, a balanced approach to a situation which has eluded adequate resolution over the duration of the Reagan Presidency. Mr. SASSER argued particularly well for a renewed attempt by the United States to vigorously pursue diplomatic means to obtain the changes we believe are necessary in the demeanor and conduct of the Sandinista regime, and the need to work more closely with our friends and allies in Central and South America and give a chance to the approach they believe is most workable—before we throw all our eggs into a military basket of questionable viability.

The American eagle holds both spears and olive branches, in equal balance. The Senator from Tennessee fleshes out a policy which, if implemented in good faith, would restore a sound balance in addressing the difficult and critical situation which now exists in Central America resulting from the character and activities of the Government of Nicaragua. As he stated in his remarks, "the United States should grasp the initiative, seeking peace through negotiations before taking a fateful step which could lead to war in Central America."

Mr. SASSER has received well-deserved praise for his leadership on this issue—including a very complimentary profile in today's issue of the New York Times, a supportive editorial in yesterday's issue of the Baltimore Sun, and wide-ranging praise in newspapers across his home State of Tennessee—including the Tennessean, the Jackson Sun, the Chattanooga Times, and the Commercial Appeal of Memphis. I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. SASSER's articulate response ot the President be printed in its entirety at this point in the RECORD, and that copies of the newspaper accounts and editorials be reprinted in the RECORD following that.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC RESPONSE OF SENATOR JIM SASSER TO PRESIDENT'S TELEVISION ADDRESS ON CENTRAL AMERICA, MARCH 16, 1986

Good evening, I'm Jim Sasser from Tennessee.

We in the Congress agree with the President about what our goals should be in Central America.

We agree that the Sandinista government has betrayed the promise of its own revolution, has suppressed the freedom of its own people, and has supported subversion against its neighbor El Salvador.

We agree that Nicaragua must never become a base for Soviet military adventurism in this hemisphere. Never.

We want the government of Nicaragua to restore political freedom to its own people and to let its neighbors develop in peace.

Our disagreement is with the means the President has used to achieve these goals. This disagreement is shared by a majority of Americans and a majority of the Congress.

Tonight, at a time of belt-tightening at home, when tens of thousands of family farms are failing and hundreds of thousands of young Americans are seeing their student loans being eliminated, the President seeks an additional $100 million to expand the undeclared war being fought in Nicaragua.

Our concern is that the President is seizing military options before he has exhausted the hope of a peaceful solution.

We believe the U.S. should grasp the initiative, seeking peace through negotiations before taking a fateful step which could lead to war in Central America.

The President calls the contras Freedom Fighters, and has even compared them to our own Founding Fathers. In fact, most contra military leaders fought against freedom as members of the Samoza regime's hated security force.

The President has spoken of Sandinista atrocities, and they certainly exist. But Sandinista atrocities, by all unbiased accounts, pale beside those of the contras, which, tragically, are being subsidized by your tax dollars.

So, let's face facts, neither side has clean hands in this war.

The Administration has already given the contras at least $100 million in the last 5 years. They can't even tell us how that money was spent. And, it has produced no military success. None. Now they seek $100 million more.

So the question must be asked: does the President's policy have any real chance of success?

To be sure, the contra army could become a thorn in the flesh of the Sandinistas. But almost nobody believes the contras can actually win a military victory.

If the President's goal is the military overthrow of the Sandinistas, then he should tell us so, because that goal simply cannot be achieved without direct U.S. military involvement in a long and costly and bloody war.

I've just recently returned from Central America. There I met with the democratically-elected leaders of Nicaragua's four neighbors—Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador.

They all want the Sandinistas contained within their own borders, but they are concerned that the United States has not given Latin America's own Contradora peace process a fair chance to work.

The President has said that we have made every effort to negotiate. But the fact is, he broke off negotiations last year. The Sandinistas now claim a willingness to resume these talks.

So we say, let's put the Sandinistas to the test.

When I returned from Central America, I proposed that we withhold military aid to the contras, seek a ceasefire between them and the Sandinistas, and initiate a bold program to force Nicaragua to bargain in good faith.

My proposal recognized that if the Sandinistas refuse to negotiate, it may be necessary, as an absolute last resort, to fund—and certainly to reform—the contras. But let's try negotiations first.

Unhappily, the President rejected this proposal in favor of immediate military aid to the contras.

This is the heart of our difference with the President. He proposes a wider war in Nicaragua, now.

As the father of a 17 year old son, I say, Mr. President, let's not rush blindly into that quagmire. We've done that before.

We believe the hour calls for statesmanship, certainly not rash nor divisive rhetoric that needlessly politicizes what should be a sober, bipartisan national debate.

We should learn from history, and recent events have shown that when our nation is together, as in the Philippines, we succeed. When we are divided, as we were in Beruit, we fail. With tragic results.

The American people want a more enlightened policy in Central America, and our great nation deserves one.

Let us call upon our diplomatic skills, upon our patience, on our wisdom, and, most of all our democratic traditions, seeking to achieve a balanced, bipartisan policy in Central America, a course of action that has a realistic chance of success, and a policy that we, as Americans, don't have to be ashamed of.

Thank you, and God bless you.

EVOLUTION OF A STAND: MEMPHIS, MARINES, MANAGUA

(By Steven V. Roberts)

WASHINGTON.—When Senator Jim Sasser of Tennessee was selected to deliver the Democratic response to President Reagan's speech on Nicaragua Sunday night, even some of his own colleagues were surprised. In nine years in the Senate, Mr. Sasser has seldom played a major role on foreign policy issues or appeared on the television talk shows.

But Mr. Sasser's emergence on the Nicaragua issue signifies a developing consensus in Democratic ranks and a new willingness to compromise with the Administration, which wants $100 million to aid the rebels fighting the Nicaraguan regime.

Instead of selecting a strident critic of the Administration to speak for the Democrats, party leaders picked a moderate Southerner who has ties to all wings of the party, a behind-the-scenes operator with good political instincts who has prospered in a conservative state, and therefore a man trusted to guide the Democrats through a tough issue that bristles with political thorns.

Almost daily for the last week, Mr. Sasser met privately with a select group of Senate Democrats, listening to their views, gauging the political climate and trying to develop an alternative to the President's plan.

Their working document is a proposal advanced by Mr. Sasser that would allocate the $100 million requested by the Administration but put it in escrow for six months while the Administration tries to negotiate a peaceful settlement with the Sandinistas who rule Nicaragua. If Congress determined at the end of that period that the Sandinistas were not negotiating in good faith, the money would be released to the rebels.

A GENUINE COMPROMISE

Mr. Sasser, a lawyer, acknowledges that his proposal gets criticism from both those members of Congress who want to send the money right away and those who want to cut the rebels off completely. But his skill is finding what he calls the "mainstream" of party sentiment, and after dozens of conversations he says he is convinced that a "substantial core" of Congress "wants this type of moderate response.

"They see it as a way to really put the Sandinistas to the test," Mr. Sasser said today, "as a way of really exhausting the possibility of negotiations in the region. What I'm proposing is a genuine compromise."

Mr. Sasser's own evolution to his middle-ground position mirrors the change in Congress on the Nicaragua issue over the last few years. In 1983 Congress barred all aid to the rebels, known as contras, and the Tennessee Democrat voted for the ban.

A year later, the Senator made his first mark on the issue when he used his position as ranking Democrat on the Appropriations subcommittee that reviews military construction projects to inspect American installations in Honduras. Unlike many politicians, Mr. Sasser tends to listen more than he talks, and he came away convinced that the Defense Department was illegally siphoning off funds to pay for air strips and other fortifications that Congress would never approve directly.

The whole situation in Central America reminded Mr. Sasser, who served six years in the Marine Corps reserve, of how the United States got drawn into Vietnam. At 49 years of age, he belongs to the generation that fought in Southeast Asia and now has draft-age children of its own.

The scars from that war still cloud his view of Nicaragua, and in his speech Sunday night he spoke feelingly of his fears: "As the father of a 17-year-old son, I say, Mr. President, let's not rush blindly into that quagmire. We've done that before."

But like many members of Congress, Mr. Sasser has grown increasingly uncomfortable with the Sandinistas and their leader, Daniel Ortega Saavedra. His memory of Vietnam has been balanced against the memory of another American foreign policy disaster.

"You see Ortega on television, with his green uniform and red collar tabs, and it reminds you of what happened 25 years ago in Cuba," the Senator said. "You can see this weighing on many of my colleagues here."

Mr. Sasser, a native of Memphis won his Senate seat in 1976 by upsetting the incumbent, Bill Brock, who is now Secretary of Labor; he survived a re-election campaign in 1982 when he was a leading target of the Republican right wing. As these elections demonstrated, he has well-turned political antennae. And recently they have picked up the vibrations many of his fellow Democrats were sensing that a politician who appeared to support the Sandinistas could be courting political trouble.

This concern was particularly acute in Southern states like Tennessee, where the anti-Communist tradition is strong and voters worry that growing Sandinista influence in Central America could send a wave of political refugees northward.

"We didn't want to be viewed as giving aid and comfort to that government," he said.

So last month Mr. Sasser decided to do some more listening, and he made a three-day swing through four countries in Latin America. His aim, he said, was to hear from leaders in the region directly, without their comments being "filtered through the State Department or anyone else."

He came back convinced, he said that these leaders wanted the United States to "keep the pressure on the Sandinistas" to negotiate more seriously. So he forged his compromise proposal and set about trying to sell it to his colleagues and to the American public.

As Congress prepares to vote on the President's aid request in the days ahead, Mr. Sasser's political instincts will face their strongest test yet. But he has not been wrong very often. Just ask the Secretary of Labor the former Senator from Tennessee.

[From the Sun (Baltimore, MD), Mar. 17, 1986]

DEBATE OVER NICARAGUA

President Reagan's $100 million proposal to aid "Contra" forces fighting the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua is in trouble because it has lost the support of key Democratic moderates such as Senator Jim Sasser of Tennessee. It was Mr. Sasser of Tennessee, not the liberal Rep. Michael Barnes of Maryland, who delivered the official Democratic reply to last night's presidential address.

Mr. Sasser made it clear what while he agrees with Mr. Reagan that the Sandinista regime has betrayed the democratic revolution that brought it to power, he disagrees with the president over the means to be used in preventing Nicaragua from becoming a Soviet base in this hemisphere. Mr. Reagan's chosen instrument is the contra insurgency; Mr. Sasser would favor another attempt at a peaceful solution. The president described the contras as "freedom fighters" who had fought the Somoza dictatorship; Mr. Sasser's retort was that most of the contra military leaders had "fought against freedom as members of the Somoza regime's hated security force. . . ."

The Tennessee senator is sponsor of a proposal to put military aid to the contras in escrow for a few more months while one last attempt is made to force the Sandinistas to accept a democratic system and stop threatening their neighbors. Mr. Reagan wants military aid immediately but might not rule out a short delay for negotiations provided money is automatically released thereafter.

In our view, Congress should continue non-military aid to the contras provided it is made part of a much larger effort to help Nicaragua's democratic neighbors contain the Sandinista regime. If negotiations fail again, as we suspect they will, there should be sufficient military aid to the contras to make them a part—but only a part—of a U.S.-supported regional security operation.

Underlying this whole debate is the tortured memory of Vietnam. It affects both sides. The president contends that unless the contras are armed and trained to stop the Sandinistas from engineering a "communist takeover of Central America," U.S. strategic interests may have to be defended eventually by U.S. troops. Senator Sasser contends that current administration policy is leading to a Vietnam-like "quagmire."

What we believe is needed at this moment is neither an endorsement nor a repudiation of administration policy by the Congress. One would signal too much U.S. faith in a contra force that may fail; the other would undercut the administration's ability to pressure Nicaragua. The answer has to be bipartisan compromise.

[From the Tennessean, Mar. 18, 1986]

MR. REAGAN MAKES A CASE BUT STILL IS NOT PERSUASIVE

In his televised address on aid for the Nicaraguan rebels, President Reagan pulled virtually all the rhetoric stops he could think of that might persuade the Congress to approve $100 million for the "virtually defenseless" contra forces.

There was a litany of necessity: to deny the Soviet Union a beachhead in North America, the malignancy in Managua that might spread to become a mortal threat to the entire New World, and not to mention that the Sandinista regime is funneling drugs into the U.S.

It has become an issue of absolutes in Mr. Reagan's mind. The Sandinistas need to be supplanted because they have become Communists and therefore are an increasing threat to the hemisphere.

A good many people believe, and with reason, that the Sandinistas have betrayed the spirit of their own revolution and that they are Marxists who are increasingly guilty of oppression against their own people.

The stated objective of the Reagan administration is to force the Sandinistas to negotiate with the contra forces. But the real aim is to supplant the Managua regime with the contras which may not be that much of an improvement if it could be done.

Sen. Jim Sasser of Tennessee who made the Democratic response to Mr. Reagan, said the U.S. had provided the contras $100 million over the past five years and yet they were unable to achieve any military success. And Senator Sasser said that while the President calls the contras freedom fighters, many "fought against freedom" in defending the dictatorial regime of Anastasio Somoza.

The contras are divided, have argued among themselves and their ranks have been depleted. They hold no village, no province, no real area of Nicaragua from which to launch attacks. Their atrocities on civilians within Nicaragua are as bad as those forces they seek to supplant. Most military experts give them no chance of defeating a large and well-armed Nicaraguan army.

So the administration proposes then to hand these rebels $100 million more, but to what purpose? The military threat represented by the contras is really no option at all. Yet from the first the White House has, as Senator Sasser reminded, seized on military options before it has "exhausted the hope of a peaceful solution.

Publicly, at least, the Central American states have not come out four-square for the American policy. The administration says this is because they hesitate to do so and thereby irritate others. What others? Cuba? Nicaragua? Several nations have been involved in the Contadora process which is based on diplomatic assumptions, not military ones.

Mr. Sasser has urged, "Let us call upon our patience, on our wisdom and, most of all on our democratic traditions to achieve a balanced bipartisan policy in Central America, a course of action that has a realistic chance of success." It might not succeed, but it is at least as promising as a military policy using the contras as proxies in an effort they can't win on their own.

[From the Chattanooga Times, Mar. 18, 1986]

THE HOUSE AND THE CONTRAS

As the U.S. House of Representatives prepares for a vote, expected on Thursday, on President Reagan's request for $100 million in aid to the Nicaraguan contras, the administration is continuing its massive selling job to win support in what is likely to be a close vote. The president's staff is lobbying members of Congress feverishly, and friends and officials of the administration have jetted around the country—former U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick's speech to the Rotary Club here last week is an example—to argue for the aid Mr. Reagan has played a leading role, using radio addresses, luncheons for the press and other forms to reiterate his message that the aid is necessary. He capped it with a nationally telecast message Sunday evening.

Yet after all this, the White House concedes the vote will be close, it can't even count on the votes of all the Republican members of the House, and there is considerable division over the issue in the Senate.

Why is this? Do the House and Seante favor a Marxist state in Nicaragua that will export its doctrine throughout Central America? Of course they don't, despite the preposterous arguments of White House Communications Director Partick Buchanan.

One explanation for the administration's trouble selling its contra proposal, we suggest, is its failure so far to enunciate any clear policy goals in Nicaragua, much less Central America. The administration seems not to have learned that the White House cannot sustain any foreign policy unless the public understands and supports it—and communicates that support to its representatives in Congress.

The United States made its first delivery of military equipment to the contras more than four years ago. In the interim, Mr. Reagan and other members of his administration have delivered scores of speeches on Nicaragua, condemning the Sandinistas and praising the contras. Yet the public according to polls conducted by the White House and others, remains unconvinced of the dangers of the Managua government. More broadly, the public still has not been persuaded specifically of the administration's intentions.

Originally we were told that the reason to aid the contras was to disrupt the flow of arms from Nicaragua to leftist guerrillas in neighboring El Salvado. That goal has been largely achieved although there are recurring reports that the guerrillas are now capturing most of their weapons from the Salvadoran government, which we are supplying.

More recently, the administration has argued that we should support the contras as a way to pressure the Sandinistas into honoring the promises they made in taking over in 1979 in return for support by the Organization of American States. Managua has said it will negotiate with the United States and cooperate with the so-called Contadora process for regional settlement of problems, but it will not negotiate with the contras as Washington suggests.

Where does all this leave us today? Now we are being told that if aid to the contras is not approved, all of Central America—as well as the United States—will be at the mercy of the Sandinistas. The vote may be the United States' last opportunity to avoid another communist stronghold in Central America, Mrs. Kirpatrick said here last week, and if Congress doesn't approve the aid the United States will "pay a heavy price".

But that argument is only an explicit assurance that the $100 million in all the contras need to turn the situation around in Nicaragua. Given the relative military strength of the Sandinistas and the contras, the argument is impossible to accept. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., points out that the purpose of Mr. Reagan's request is to arm and equip approximately 10,000 contras. As impressive as that army might be, it's not likely to overwhelm the Sandinista army. That means (1) we would have to sustain the contras for years to come because (2) they have not generated widespread political support within Nicaragua, thus reducing their chances of overthrowing the Sandinista regime. One reason they haven't is that the contras, led largely by former members of the Somoza regime's National Guard, are every bit as brutal, it not more so, than the Sandinistas.

Mr. Reagan said Sunday the $100 million will "provide the assistance the freedom fighters need to deal with Russian tanks and gunships." Will Congress provide that aid, he asked, "or will they abandon the democratic resistance to its communist enemy?"

Sorry, but the issue can't be framed quite so simply. The disagreement here is not over the ends—whether the Sandinista regime should be restrained—but the means for doing it. We are not going to restrain the Sandinistas, and thereby reduce the Soviet influence in Nicaragua and Central America with a mere $100 million in military aid. If anything, the influence will increase. And what happens after the $100 million runs out? The temptation will be to counter it with American troops, the administration's protestations to the contrary notwithstanding.

The battle for the soul, and the future of Nicaragua is not going to be won in the halls of Congress but in Central America. And it is not going to be won militarily—not unless Mr. Reagan intends to commit U.S. troops to overthrowing the Sandinistas. Congress should not approve any money for military hardware until it and the public are persuaded that the President has exhausted all diplomatic possibilities for a regionally based political solution.

That was the thrust of the Democratic response, delivered by Sen. Jim Sasser, to Mr. Reagan's address Sunday evening. The Sasser address exemplified reasonable disagreement, which is sorely needed in the current debate. In that regard, it was not just a Democratic response; many Republicans in the House and Senate share the concern that the administration's unquestioning reliance on a military approach ignores the wiser political alternative. That solution must be two-fold: a peace agreement, proposed and signed by the United States, that is based on the aims of the Contadora group, and which contains verification and enforcement procedures.

Second, the agreement should be accompanied by more tangible assistance, such as the full $1.2 billion in economic assistance suggested in the five-year Jackson Plan in 1984. The aid allotted for the region in fiscal 1985 and 1986 was 20 percent below recommended amounts. It is foolish to raise hopes on the region for greater democracy and then refuse, through under-funding, to help produce a reasonable alternative to the status quo.

The administration argues that this is an issue to be faced as Americans, not as Republicans or Democrats. True enough. But its failure to outline a coherent policy toward Nicaragua is the reason the American public remains skeptical of the warnings—and why there is no guarantee Congress will approve the aid.

[From the Jackson Sun, Mar. 16, 1986]

SASSER PLAN IS A GOOD ONE

The U.S. can't win in Nicaragua no matter which side it takes.

The country can't support the empowered Sandinistas; they're nearly as ruthless as their predecessors. But the contras President Reagan is insisting upon supporting aren't much better either; they are part of the old, repressive government.

That's why Sen. James Sasser's proposal calling for new regulations makes sense. The U.S. won't lose much and might succeed in pushing for a settlement. Sasser's offer, in fact, is a welcome relief from some of the high-pitched rhetoric that the administration has been making lately.

Tennessee's senior senator wants to see any military aid put in escrow for six months. During that time the U.S. would enter into negotiations with the Sandinistas and require them to negotiate in turn with their opponents in Nicaragua. A ceasefire would be declared while the talks are going on. The U.S. wouldn't perform its military exercises in the area if the Sandinistas would agree to stop shipment of arms from the Soviet Union.

The aim is to strike a balance—get the Sandinistas to recognize their opposition and try to get a democratically based coalition government. The plan at least forestalls alarming administration hints of putting U.S. forces there to help out.

If the proposal doesn't work, take the military aid put in escrow and give it to the contras, Sasser is suggesting. The U.S. doesn't have to take sides until all other efforts are exhausted.

The senator's call for negotiation is just what many Central and South American countries, including Mexico, have been urging the U.S. to do as Nicaragua's neighbors, they have a stake in preserving peace and they should know how to help bring that about.

Sasser's plan could end up benefiting Nicaragua, but in the short term, it would at least end the terrible stalemates between Congress and the administration on the issue. Congress has learned to its dismay that President Daniel Ortega is no saint; he's loyal to the Soviets and Cuban. But few are blinded to the shortcomings of the contras.

A plan that recognizes the complexities of the situation deserves a chance to succeed.

[From the Commercial Appeal (Memphis, TN), Mar. 14, 1986]

A WAR AGAINST REALITY

The Reagan administration has toned down its rhetoric about Nicaragua in recent days but the latest push for military aid to the U.S.-backed rebels continues to challenge if not to defy reality.

Just last week President Reagan was saying that failure to give the rebels the aid he has requested would lead to the establishment of a Soviet-Cuban base in Nicaragua and to the spread of Communist revolution throughout Central America.

Then the appointment of Philip Habib as a special envoy to Central America raised the possibility that the administration would seek a compromise with Congress, which has shown stiff opposition to the military aid proposal.

Habib is a veteran foreign policy troubleshooter. His latest success was in helping to negotiate the departure of Ferdinand Marcos from the Philippines. Earlier he was involved in Middle East negotiations.

So it was logical to speculate that Habib's new assignment indicated an administration shift toward talks with Nicaragua's Sandinista government.

But a shift, if it exists, appears so far to be negligible.

Habib has repeated a fall-back administration position that negotiations with the Sandinistas can resume only if they agree to talk directly with the rebels.

That sounds reasonable except for one fact: The rebels can't agree to talk among themselves.

The rebel or contra forces are split—and deeply split—between two factions. The faction based in Costa Rica is headed by former members of the Sandinista junta, which overthrew the dictator Somoza. The other, based in Honduras, is led by former leaders of the Somoza regime. Efforts to bring the two factions together under a common command have failed. That is one reason, perhaps, for both the poor performance of the contras in the field and their lack of popular support within Nicaragua.

Whatever case can be made for the rebels, the continued leadership of former Somozan officers undermines contra credibility.

Why should the Sandinistas talk with the rebels? Guerrilla attacks have not been successful in weakening Sandinista control of the country. By all reports, in fact, the rebels are weakening. They seem to have no prospects of mounting a significant military threat.

The administration would argue, presumably, that the contras are just one element of pressure that is necessary to force the Sandinistas to negotiate.

But the administration is really saying that it wants the contras to share power so that the Sandinista government loses power. The goal is still what Reagan said it was before his rhetoric softened: To overthrow the Sandinistas.

Now, this may be a desirable goal in the best of all possible worlds. Realistic expectations, however, may have to be different. Is there another way for the United States to exert pressure toward an acceptable, if not perfect, solution? Is there a possible settlement that would allow the internal realities of Nicaraguan society to work out nonviolent political change without endangering neighboring countries?

Sen. Jim Sasser (D-Tenn.), for one, thinks there is. He has proposed that military aid to the contras be held up for six months while the United States pursues direct talks with the Sandinistas.

Sasser sets conditions for both sides. The Sandinistas would have to negotiate also with their internal opposition (not the contras), to abide by a ceasefire with the contras, to suspend arms shipments from Cuba and the Soviet Union and to stop aid to the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador. The United States would have to cease military exercises in Honduras, hold up military aid to the contras and guarantee that the contras would accept a ceasefire.

The objective of such negotiations might be to open up Nicaraguan society to the liberating influence of economic and political relations with its neighbors and with the United States, to eliminate outside (Soviet, Cuban, and American) military advisers and bases in Central America, and to prevent subversion from Nicaragua or anywhere else in the region.

Would the Sandinistas accept a settlement along those lines? The Nicaraguan government itself has indicated that they would. Such a settlement also would be supported by most Central American and South American nations.

There is a body of expert opinion in the United States and elsewhere, that Nicaragua would be far more responsive to normal relations with other countries than the Reagan administration thinks it would be.

This body of opinion agrees that the top Sandinista leaders are Marxist-Leninists who believe in dictatorial control, revolution, the elimination of opponents and minimum public freedom. But it also maintains that those leaders are not highly competent, that many lower-level officials in the government and the military are more interested in economic growth than ideology, that contra attacks and U.S. sanctions only create a siege environment that helps the Sandinistas maintain control and that a compromise between Nicaragua and the United States could lead to the very changes the United States would like to see.

These are possibilities that should be explored. And the Sasser proposals, or something similar, are the way to do it.

FORMER SENATOR JACOB JAVITS

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, we were all deeply saddened to learn recently of the death of a former colleague—Senator Jacob Javits of New York.

Jacob Javits has been characterized as the Senator's Senator and as an individual who exemplified the best qualities of public service. These are well-deserved plaudits. Yet, from a personal standpoint, Jacob Javits' life of public service has special meaning for me, for there probably has not been a public figure in modern times who has made such an intellectual and substantive contribution to the issues of war and peace than Jacob Javits.

I remember 15 years ago when I appeared before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations as the spokesman for Vietnam Veterans Against the War. I remember the frustration, the pain, the sense of helplessness and hopelessness on the part of those of us who served in Vietnam, whose pleas had gone unheeded for so long by two successive administrations. We turned to the only institution which was open to our pleas—the U.S. Congress. And we found a sympathetic and willing ally in Jacob Javits.

Senator Javits was very gracious in welcoming me to the committee hearing held that morning of April 22, 1971. He had already demonstrated his deep sense of concern by personally visiting our encampment on The Mall the day before.

While we made our plea for an immediate end to U.S. involvement in Vietnam, it took 4 more years for that reality to materialize. However, Jacob Javits was not idle in his determination that there should not be any more Vietnams. He undertook the key leadership role as the prime intellectual architect of one of the most important pieces of legislation ever to be enacted into law by our Government—the war powers resolution which was passed over Presidential veto 2 years after that hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee.

On October 26, 1985, I had the honor to be invited to participate in the Jacob Javits Collection Inaugural Conference on "Congress and United States Foreign Policy." The conference was held in Stony Brook, NY, and focused on the struggle between the executive and legislative branches of Government over the exercise of the warmaking powers of our Government.

Prior to that conference, the fall 1985 issue of Foreign Affairs carried his article evaluating the war powers resolution. In providing me a copy of that article, Senator Javits wrote me a personal letter stating:

> I hope very much that you will read the piece, as I believe it deals with one of the historic safeguards of our time, respecting restraint on the power of U.S. Presidents to put the country into war except with the consent of the Congress. I believe it is fair to say that the people who pay and suffer and die in war look to members of Congress to use this power of restraint with wisdom as well as patriotism.

Fifteen years earlier, in testimony on behalf of his war powers legislation before his own Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Javits had this to say:

> . . . We live in an age of undeclared war, which has meant Presidential war. Prolonged engagement in undeclared Presidential war has created a most dangerous imbalance in our constitutional system of checks and balances.

It is remarkable that to the very end Jacob Javits carried with him this concern for Presidential abuse of the warmaking powers of our Government. The fact that it continued to plague him that the war powers resolution mechanism remained an imperfect vehicle for resolving this perennial executive-legislative branch struggle is a tribute to his intellectual and personal integrity.

We all owe Jacob Javits a debt of gratitude for his lifetime commitment to playing a constructive and positive role on issues of war and peace. He will be greatly missed by Senate and country alike.

THE LATE SENATOR JACOB K. JAVITS

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, we still mourn the death of Jacob K. Javits. There have been few who have passed through these Halls who have deserved the title of Senator more than Jack Javits. He set a standard for service to the public and to this great democratic institution that the rest of us can only hope to match.

Jack Javits was one of the first people to congratulate me and offer advice when I became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. It was a post that he long desired and deserved. I always looked to Jack Javits for direction when I served under him on the committee, and when I became chairman after his departure from the Senate I continued to look to him for assistance.

Jack Javits remained a man of the Senate even in his final days. When I returned from New York last week to attend his funeral, I received a letter from Jack postmarked that same day. It was a letter written on February 28 congratulating me and the Senate for passing the Genocide Treaty. He wrote that the vote "vindicated both the understanding and justice of the American people."

More than that vote, the life of Senator Jacob K. Javits was not only a vindication but a celebration of that American understanding and justice.

FRIENDS OF IRELAND ST. PATRICK'S DAY STATEMENT, 1986

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for the 10th successive year, the Friends of Ireland in Congress have joined together in an annual St. Patrick's Day statement on Northern Ireland.

This year, there is special hope for progress; 1985 brought the most important new initiative for peace in many years. The British and Irish Governments joined together in signing an historic accord that laid the foundation for an end to the violence and conflict between the two traditions in Northern Ireland.

Our statement this year urges all those who seek peace in Northern Ireland to work for the successful implementation of the accord, so that lasting peace may finally come to Northern Ireland.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to give thoughtful consideration to our statement and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRIENDS OF IRELAND ST. PATRICK'S DAY STATEMENT, MARCH 17, 1986

Irish Americans and indeed all Americans have a special reason to commemorate this St. Patrick's Day. After 17 years of strife and turmoil in Northern Ireland, there is real hope that a lasting and just peace may finally be achieved.

Over the past year we have witnessed substantial progress toward our long-standing hope to achieve reconciliation between the conflicting traditions of Northern Ireland and to establish democratic political structures which will accommodate both sides of the community.

As Friends of Ireland in the Congress, we endorsed the principles of the New Ireland Forum Report of 1984 for a negotiated settlement to the crisis in Northern Ireland. We commend all those whose courage and commitment to peace and reconciliation culminated in the signing of the historic Anglo-Irish Agreement last November at Hillsborough in Northern Ireland by Prime Minister Garret FitzGerald of Ireland and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Great Britain.

We welcome this agreement as a long overdue step toward full recognition of the rights of both traditions in Northern Ireland and as a hopeful opportunity to end the violence and political and economic instability that has cost over 2,500 lives and wreaked havoc on the region's economy in the past two decades. The agreement rejects violence as a means of achieving political ends and commits both the Irish and British governments to an ongoing process to achieve peace and stability in Northern Ireland.

The Friends of Ireland welcome the inclusion in the accord of an unprecedented role for the Irish Government in the day to day affairs of Northern Ireland. We believe that this provision offers reasonable and needed reassurance to the minority Catholic community that its legitimate rights and interests, particularly in relation to the administration of justice, will be clearly recognized and fully protected.

The United States has a long and close relationship with both Britain and Ireland and can play an important role in helping these two friends achieve peace in Northern Ireland. We welcome President Reagan's support for the accord and his proposal for U.S. financial assistance to Northern Ireland, and we urge the Congress to act favorably and expeditiously on legislation to provide such assistance.

Finally, we renew our condemnation of those in Northern Ireland—and in the United States—who advocate, support, or engage in violence in any form or by any means.

On this St. Patrick's Day, we again express our commitment to the great goal of Irish unity, achieved by peaceful methods, and we pledge in the coming year to continue our efforts for peace and reconciliation, and for a new Ireland free from violence, intolerance, and discrimination. The events of 1985 laid a workable foundation for peace and a durable settlement of the conflict in Northern Ireland, and we urge all sides to build on that foundation in 1986.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANFORTH). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am advised that when we discussed the balanced budget constitutional amendment with the agreement to vote on March 25, we did not have third reading and we did not adopt the Thurmond amendment.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that we lay before the Senate, Senate Joint Resolution 225 and that we adopt the Thurmond amendment and have third reading.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, that was the understanding of the unanimous-consent agreement entered into. That was the understanding of the principal players, if I may call them that, those who are counting on the colloquy, those who might offer the amendment that is mentioned in the agreement, and also Senators such as Senator METZENBAUM and others.

So I have no reservation and support the majority leader's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution will be considered as being amended and read a third time.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished minority leader for calling this to my attention.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, also, if we can dispose of the CCC supplemental, I understand the Budget Committee is looking at the provisions suggested by the distinguished manager on this side, Senator COCHRAN. If there is an opportunity to do that even a bit after 12 noon, we could stay beyond 12 noon.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield, I am delighted the majority leader has brought this subject up. It had been our hope that we could bring it to the floor at about 11 a.m. this morning. Because of hearings and requirements of other duties of Senators, it has taken a little while to review some suggested language that may be included in this appropriations bill that will permit it to be accepted by the House of Representatives and sent to the President so that this $5 billion could be made available immediately.

It is an important and urgent matter that needs the immediate attention of the Senate. Language is being reviewed at the present time by the staff and the chairman of the Budget Committee in hope that it can be approved.

We may be able to adopt that by unanimous consent, and that is the hope of the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Montana is here on the floor and is trying to help get this worked out. We appreciate his assistance and contribution to the effort.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I understand, there will be two amendments, one that the Senator from Mississippi would offer and one the Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER, would offer and that they are now in the clearance process, but the Senator from Mississippi is awaiting word either on one or both amendments from the Budget Committee.

I hope that we can contact the Budget Committee to determine, hopefully, before noon, if we could proceed to act on this measure. It is important we do it today. I am not certain what ASC offices are doing without the money.

Mr. COCHRAN. Nothing, if the majority leader will yield.

Mr. DOLE. So it is very important to the American farmer that we act today and, if we could act even as late as 12:15 today, it would expedite the measure going to the House. So I will make an effort right now to find out what the Budget Committee would have in mind.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MELCHER. The level of funding that is available that is not in question for the Farmers Home Administration for the purposes of operating loans for farmers is $1.7 billion. It is agreed, I think, by almost everybody that no point of order would lie against the correction within this particular measure that that money be utilized and loans be made.

In addition to that, there is something above $900 million that was appropriated last year that was subject to the point of order that was raised here in the Senate against the language that was in the measure. And because of that, the $900 million, I believe, should be looked at carefully, not for purposes of spending it, since that will be prohibited, but for purposes of defining what the need might be as we go through the balance of the fiscal year. And if those needs are closely monitored by the Secretary of Agriculture and the President, perhaps they would want to advise us and have Congress take whatever appropriate action is necessary to make those funds available.

Language that would do that has been sent over to the chairman of the Budget Committee and his staff, and as soon as we have word back from them, I suspect we would be ready to go.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana. I am advised that the Budget Committee is now taking a look at the amendment of the Senator from Montana. They have no difficulty, as he indicated, with the other amendment. So we could either take that amendment and await the Budget Committee's approval of the second amendment or do both at the same time. I guess it will not take very long once we have an agreement.

Mr. COCHRAN. If the majority leader will yield, it would be my hope that we could get the matter before the Senate and get unanimous consent to agree to an amendment which we would substitute in place of the language that was ruled to be subject to a point of order last Thursday night. That would send the conference report back to the House. We are advised that the other body would agree with the language that this Senator would submit as an amendment to be inserted in place of the amendment in disagreement that was ruled subject to the point of order.

I understand the Senator from Montana has a suggestion for some additional language to be added. The Budget Committee, I am told, has no quarrel with the language that is in the amendment that would be submitted by this Senator, but the other language is still under review and we do not have a response from the Budget Committee as to whether it can approve or support this additional language.

I personally do not have any problem with it. But it did not have any problem with the language that was submitted to the Senate last Thursday, which was ruled to be subject to the point of order. So we will have to await the advice of the chairman of the Budget Committee as to whether or not an objection would be raised or a point of order suggested to the additional language that has been brought to our attention and suggested by the distinguished Senator from Montana.

So, to answer the majority leader, I wish to thank him for his efforts to try to get this matter before the Senate at this time and to even delay the scheduled noon recess for a few minutes if we can work this out. We still await the response from the chairman of the Budget Committee. I hope we can get this matter resolved within the next few minutes.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

If there is no objection, while the distinguished minority leader is on the floor, I wonder if we might stand in recess, rather than at noon, at 12:15.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM 12:30 P.M. UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my understanding we are about ready to move on the CCC supplemental. Therefore, I ask that the recess begin at 12:30 p.m., rather than 12:15 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of the House message on House Joint Resolution 534, the CCC supplemental, and that this Senator be recognized to offer an amendment which would strike the last paragraph of the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I simply want to state for the record that Senator EXON, who earlier had some problem with the measure, has cleared it for action at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I also ask unanimous consent that an amendment I shall offer to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi be in order.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the Senator's request, let me simply state in explanation that it is my intention that the amendment which will be offered by the Senator from Mississippi under the unanimous-consent request as propounded would be the language deleting the last paragraph of the House amendment and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "It is agreed that at least $1.7 billion is available for the Insured Operating Loan Program of the Farmers Home Administration. Therefore, the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farm owners." And that added to the amendment at that point would be the language developed by the Senator from Montana so that each suggestion, both the suggestion of the Senator from Montana and the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, will be included as one amendment for the purpose of this exercise. With that understanding, I hope the Senator will withdraw his reservation to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I have no objection whatsoever.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, for the purpose of completing the record, I ask unanimous consent that the Cochran amendment be the only amendment in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. And I further ask unanimous consent that no point of order be in order with respect to the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask a parliamentary inquiry. I think we have established that in one amendment we will incorporate two amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURDICK. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous consent request is agreed to.

The following message from the House of Representatives was laid before the Senate by the Presiding Officer.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution (H.J. Res. 534) entitled "Joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes", and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

Restore the matter stricken by said amendment, amended to read as follows: ": Provided further, That after fiscal year 1987, funds available to the Corporation may be used to carry out section 1241(a)(1) of the Food Security Act of 1985, only such extent or in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts. The signup agreement should not reduce total production below levels needed to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for an adequate supply for export by either the Commodity Credit Corporation or private corporations or individuals at competitive prices; since by law the proceeds from sales become available for use by the Commodity Credit Corporation, such sales should reduce future appropriations: Provided further, That the conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program.

"The level of funds previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, as provided in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 for Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, shall be available until expended except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has assisted in developing this language which expresses the view of the Senate, and I think the House will certainly go along with this, that if the Secretary—I am reading from language the Senator from Montana has suggested, which is included in this amendment—determines that available funds for the Insured Operating Loan Program are exhausted and the President certifies that additional funds are essential to meet emergency credit needs of farmers and ranchers, then the Secretary should request additional funding previously appropriated for the program of the Farmers Home Administration—all of this, of course, subject to the sequester order of March 1, 1986.

I think this puts at rest, Mr. President, the concern that many of us had which was expressed in the conference report and in the amendment in disagreement that the Farmers Home Administration proceed as expeditiously as possible and with the funds that are available or can be made available under existing law to help meet the emergency credit needs of farmers. I think this clearly spells out that that is what we are trying to do by the inclusion of this language. We have received the support of the Budget Committee chairman. There is no violation of the Budget Act, we are told, by this language. We are confident that the House will be able to accept this.

Again, I express my appreciation to the Senator from Montana and also the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, for their help and assistance in getting this matter before the Senate at this time.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, we are in agreement on this side.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, it is clear that the Congress has appropriated slightly in excess of $2.6 billion for the Insured Operating Loan Program at the Farmers Home Administration. In addition to that money appropriated, the President by transferring some funds made available to Farmers Home Administration, added $700 million. At the same time it was made clear that all of the $2.6 billion which Congress had appropriated would not be expended as far as the administration was concerned.

I do not really understand this procedure of transferring some funds within the Department of Agriculture to the Farmers Home Administration; namely, the $700 million, while there are still unexpended funds already appropriated by Congress for the Farmers Home Administration Insured Operating Loan Program. Be that as it may, the need for operating loans is there, and the concern that all of us who work on the authorizing committees, as well as the Appropriations Committees, share is that those needs be met and that there has been some delay at the Farmers Home Administration in putting out the loans and making certain that the applications of qualified borrowers, are processed and that the loans are made.

The purpose of this language, as I see it, on this particular measure before us dealing primarily with the Commodity Credit Corporation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the Senate is to stand in recess at 12:30, unless there is unanimous consent that it remain in session for another minute or two.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the recess be delayed for 5 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, we feel that the need for these operating loans is there. The purpose of adding this language to the supplemental appropriation covering primarily the Commodity Credit Corporation is to make sure that, first of all, the $1.7 billion that is available and that has been appropriated by Congress at the level authorized in the farm bill passed last December will be utilized and made available now, without too much delay.

In addition, the amendment now before us to the conference report directs the Secretary of Agriculture to monitor the status of the Farmers Home Administration operating loan funds; and if it runs out of the $700 million that was transferred by administrative action for Farmers Home purposes and runs out of $1.7 billion that has been available through appropriation, as authorized by the farm bill last December—that if the need for those funds is going to be exceeded, to request of Congress to take whatever appropriate action is necessary to make available the $900 million that is also appropriated.

What I am saying is that this money has been appropriated; and if it is all going to be necessary for the Farmers Home Administration, let us make it all available. We are asking the Secretary to monitor it carefully during the remainder of the year, to see if that need arises.

AMENDMENT NO. 1698

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] proposes an amendment numbered 1698.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Delete the last paragraph of the House amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"It is agreed that at least $1,700,000,000 is available for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration. Therefore, the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farm owners.

"In addition, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that available funds for the insured operating loan program of the Farmer Home Administration are exhausted, and the President certifies that additional funds for such programs are essential to meet emergency credit needs of American farmers and ranchers, that the Secretary should request that the additional funding previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, as provided for in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 for Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, and as reduced pursuant to the sequester order of March 1, 1986 under Public Law 99-177, be made available by appropriate actions by Congress."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 1 with the further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURDICK. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess.

Thereupon, at 12:33 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. HATCH].

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will go into executive session, and resume the consideration of the nomination of Sidney A. Fitzwater, of Texas, to be U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Texas, on which there shall be 1 hour of debate with the time equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND.]

The nomination will be stated.

THE JUDICIARY

NOMINATION OF SIDNEY A. FITZWATER TO BE U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Sidney A. Fitzwater, of Texas, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Texas.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time remains now before the vote is recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be 26 minutes on each side.

Mr. KENNEDY. Who is the time assigned to, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time is under the control of the Senator from South Carolina, or his designee, and the Senator from Massachusetts, equally divided.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. President, I oppose the nomination of Sidney Fitzwater to be a Federal district judge for the northern district of Texas because he has demonstrated that he utterly lacks respect for the fundamental right which is the cornerstone of our democracy—the right of vote.

In the 1982 elections in Texas, Fitzwater personally participated in a partisan scheme to disenfranchise minority voters in Dallas County. He posted threatening signs in minority precincts, warning: "You Can Be Imprisoned" and "Don't Risk It." His activities were found to be a violation of the Voting Rights Act by the U.S. Justice Department. Now, Fitzwater is seeking to be a Federal district judge for the very area where he was posting intimidating signs the night before election day in 1982. If confirmed, Fitzwater could be the judge who determines whether partisan political activity has abridged the voting rights of minority citizens in future elections in Dallas County and throughout the northern district of Texas.

It is important to consider Fitzwater's actions in 1982 in light of our sad history of voting rights violations. The Senate Judiciary Committee, in its report supporting the extension of the Voting Rights Act in May 1982 made the following findings:

Although we have come a long way since 1965, the nation's task in securing voting rights is not finished. Continued progress toward equal opportunity in the electoral process will be halted if we abandon the Act's crucial safeguards now.

The Committee is equally concerned about the risk of losing what progress has already been won. The gains are fragile. Without the preclearance of new laws, many of the advances of the past decade could be wiped out overnight with new schemes and devices.

Mr. President, the Republican ballot security program in which Fitzwater participated scarcely 6 months after the Senate Judiciary Committee issued its report on the Voting Rights Act is a disgraceful example of the schemes to undermine the gains won under the Voting Rights Act about which the committee was concerned.

Fitzwater has stated that he posted the signs as part of a Republican ballot security program aimed at reducing voting fraud. In response to complaints from Robert Greenberg, former Dallas County Democratic chairman and others, the U.S. Justice Department investigated the sign-posting incident. By letter dated July 26, 1983, from William Bradford Reynolds, Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, to Ms. Connie Drake, elections administrator, Dallas County, the Justice Department made the following findings and conclusions:

. . . Our investigation confirmed that signs warning voters of the possible repercussions of illegal voting were posted by Sheriff's deputies and other individuals at a number of precincts in the county. The information we have indicates that most of the signs were placed at precincts where black voters were assigned to vote. We are concerned that no nonracial justification has been offered for placing most of the signs at minority precincts. Of course, it is not improper to enforce state laws designed to prevent voter fraud, but we have received no information that such fraud was any more likely to occur in the black voting precincts than at white voting precincts.

It is our understanding that you have taken steps to ensure that the above problems do not occur in future elections. Your report following the 1982 general election . . . also proposed that all future election materials to be posted at polling places (such as voter fraud warnings) be distributed to the judges by the Elections Department as had been done before the November 2, 1982, general election. We have no information regarding whether these recommendations will be implemented.

I would appreciate your advising us within thirty days of the receipt of this letter as to the specific action which will be taken by the county to assure compliance with federal laws in future elections. . . .

Fitzwater's posting of intimidating signs in minority precincts makes him demonstrably unfit to be a guardian of the voting rights of minority citizens. The likely effect on minority voters of the signs posted by Fitzwater was described by Andrew Hernandez, deputy director, Southwest Voter Registration Education Project, during Fitzwater's confirmation hearing on February 5, 1986:

. . . I think it is important to look at this, and look at it seriously and put yourself in the place of a first-time voter. For the Mexican American community, that is what I want us to think of; not as an elderly voter, but a first-time voter.

You are coming in to vote for the first time; you have been persuaded to vote because you have been told that it is your right, that you have an interest. You come in to vote for the first time. You know, as has been suggested, Senator, that sometimes law enforcement officers are not considered your friends in the neighborhood.

And you go up and see a big sign that says you can be imprisoned. Now, I do not know what we think about voters, but I know that most ordinary voters who have never voted before who come out of a history of intimidation and harassment—if you read number, two, "If you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote," they are not going to sit there and think, well, that must be directed to the election judges or that must be directed to someone else. That is not what it says. It says you can be imprisoned if you influence or try to influence someone to vote.

Well, somebody may have just tried to influence someone to vote as they came in outside the 100-foot marker. They may have even tried to do that themselves as they were walking down the street and saw a neighbor.

So the voter would be left with the impression—I think anybody with any reasonable judgment on this question would agree with that—the voter would be left with the impression that if they had tried to influence someone to vote that there would be a chance they could be imprisoned.

Now, I think the implicit message is down at the bottom, "Don't Risk It." Now, you may not have broken the law or you may have broken the law, but the point is do not risk it, and do not risk it by voting; do not risk it by voting.

In his testimony before the Judiciary Committee on this nomination, Congressman MICKEY LELAND from Texas, the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, discussed the impact of Fitzwater's signs on elderly black voters:

. . . The people who would be intimidated the most are the older people who had been intimidated in their lifetimes when white people disallowed for them to participate at the polling place or disallowed for them to vote for whomever it is that they felt was necessary through various and sundry schemes.

This only represents a bringing back of that kind of intimidation and it scares those senior citizens in our community. Some are not as well educated as others. You know, they are frightened a lot easier than others.

But the one thing that they value very dearest to them, and particularly black senior citizens, is that right to vote because it took them so long to get it and they hold it as a very precious facility in our country.

But when these kinds of things happen and they are too afraid to participate, they become very, very upset and it hurts them very deeply.

Other judges in Dallas County recognized the impropriety of the signs and refused to post them. According to a report in the Dallas Morning News dated November 12, 1982, State Judge Ed Kinkeade was asked to post the signs used by Fitzwater but did not do so. "'I didn't even look at them,' he said. 'I just assumed it was another campaign thing.'" The same report states that Judge Kelly Loving was asked to post the signs but declined to do so after discussing them with a South Dallas election judge. Loving described his conversation with the election judge as follows: "'We sat down and talked about it for at least a half-hour. At the end of the conversation, he and I thought it was an affront to him that he wasn't running a tight ship. I was beginning to think it (the sign) was in poor taste. I took the other signs and threw them away,' Loving said."

I understand that State Judge McDowell advised that at the close of business on election eve, he took the signs and precinct lists, put them in the trunk of his car, and did not do anything about the signs that night. The next day, election day, McDowell began to have second thoughts about getting involved in posting the signs. He felt it was something a judge should not be doing.

Fitzwater and the junior Senator from Texas have consistently defended the signs Fitzwater posted as being consistent with Texas election law in 1982. In light of this claim, I asked Attorney General Mattox for his opinion of Texas law. His reply, dated March 13, reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: You have asked whether the contents of certain signs placed at predominantly minority polling places within Dallas County for the 1982 general election were consistent with Texas law. Apparently, Judge Sidney Fitzwater participated in the placement of signs at the polling places within view of the voters which contained, among other matters, the following statements:

You can be imprisoned—

1. If you offer, accept or agree to offer or accept money, or anything else of value to vote or not to vote.

2. If you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote . . .

4. If you let a person vote more than once . . .

The first statement, by extending the purported prohibition to "anything of value" is not only at variance with the contents of the former Section 36.02, Texas Penal Code; it exceeds the scope of the conduct actually prohibited. The phrase "pecuniary benefit" was carefully defined by Article 36.01, Texas Penal Code (as existed in 1982), and was not so broad as to include "anything of value."

The second admonition is far broader than the terms of the former Article 145.24, Texas Election Code, which merely prohibits influencing a voter while "in the room where an election . . . is being held . . ."

The fourth admonition, by being taken out of its proper context, also is incorrect. Since the signs were obviously to be visible to voters at a polling place, they implied that the voters might be responsible for the conduct of the election workers. The admonition also is beyond the scope of Article 15.42, Texas Election Code, for the reason that the statute only prohibits the affirmative conduct of aiding, advising or procuring certain illegal voting.

I have been advised that in 1982, then Secretary of State David Dean was requested to approve the placement of the signs. He refused to approve the placement and instructed Dallas County officials that the signs should not be posted. He expressed concerns about potential intimidation of Dallas County voters.

I personally observed the signs at my polling place in East Dallas in 1982 and viewed them with alarm. There is no doubt in my mind that the signs were placed there to intimidate minority voters.

The contents of the sign appear to be so far beyond the scope of authentic Texas law that the good faith of any attorney who might have participated in their placement would be subject to inquiry.

Sincerely,

JIM MATTOX,
Attorney General.

The sign posted by Fitzwater does not state Texas law. He has stated that he read the sign five times before he posted it anyway in only minority precincts.

Mr. President, I say that anyone who read that should have understood just from the reading of it that it did not comply with Texas law and violated the first amendment. And if they do not do it, they should not be on the bench. And if he did understand that it did violate Texas law, he ought to be impeached. I hope the Senate will vote against cloture.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding. I would like to first begin by addressing head on the issue about the sign and then I would like to talk a little bit about Sid Fitzwater. I first ask unanimous consent that Judge Fitzwater's response to the items in the sign, his citations of Texas law as they existed in 1982 be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESPONSE

In November, 1982, section 36.02(a) (1) of the Texas Penal Code, entitled "Bribery," provided, in pertinent part:

(a) A person commits an offense if he intentionally or knowingly offers, confers, or agrees to confer on another, or solicits, accepts, or agrees to accept from another:

(1) any pecuniary benefit as consideration for the recipient's decision, opinion, recommendation, vote, or other exercise of discretion as a public servant, party official, or voter;

(Emphasis added). The offense of bribery was a second degree felony, punishable by imprisonment for a term of 2-20 years.

As the sign reads, and given where the signs were to be placed, this item, as well as item 4, appears to be directed at election officers who were operating the polling place. In November, 1982, article 15.24 of the Texas Election Code, entitled "Influencing voter," provided:

Any judge, clerk, or other person who may be in the room where an election, either primary, special or general, is being held, who there indicates by word or sign how he desires a citizen to vote or not to vote, shall be fined not less than two hundred nor more than five hundred dollars and be confined in jail not less than ten nor more than thirty days.

The period of imprisonment, 10-30 days, is set forth in the statute.

In November, 1982, article 15.41 of the Texas Election Code, entitled "Illegal voting," provided:

If any person knowing himself not to be a qualified voter, shall at any election vote for or against any officer to be then chosen, or for or against any proposition to be determined by said election, he shall be guilty of a third degree felony.

Pursuant to article 5.02(a) of the Election Code, a qualified voter was a person who, among other things, "has complied with the registration requirements of this code." In November, 1982, a third degree felony was punishable by imprisonment for a term of 2-10 years.

As indicated above, this item, like item 2, appears to be directed at election officers who were operating the polling place. In November, 1982, article 15.42 of the Texas Election Code, entitled "Instigating illegal voting," provided:

Whoever shall procure, aid, or advise another to give his vote at any election, knowing that person is not qualified to vote, or shall procure, aid, or advise another to give his vote more than once at such election, shall be guilty of a felony of the third degree.

(Emphasis added.) In November, 1982, a third degree felony was punishable by imprisonment for a term of 2-10 years.

ITEM 5

In November, 1982, article 15.48 of the Texas Election Code, entitled "Falsely personating another," provided:

Whoever attempts to falsely personate at an election another person, and vote or attempt to vote on the authority of a voter registration certificate not issued to him by the county's registrar of voters shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than five years.

The period of imprisonment, 3-5 years, is set forth in the statute.

ITEM 6

In November, 1982, there were various provisions of the Texas Election Code and election-related provisions of the Texas Penal Code for which one who violated such a provision could be imprisoned.

SIDNEY ALLEN FITZWATER.

Dated: January 29, 1986.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, let me make the following points. I have put in the RECORD for those who are interested in the facts the same outline that Sid Fitzwater used in his testimony before the committee to relate the content of the signs to the content of Texas election law in 1982.

In 1980, Mr. President, there was massive vote fraud in Dallas County and much of that vote fraud was concentrated in south Dallas County. A grand jury was set up, 11 indictments came forward, election judges were subsequently removed, and 6 people were found guilty of committing election fraud. Two of those people were workers for Jim Maddox, who at the time was running for reelection to Congress and is now the attorney general of the State of Texas.

As a result of concern that has lingered now for many years about vote fraud in Dallas County, on the heels of the 1980 election, the sheriff, as a partisan Republican in consultation with members of the judiciary and members of the sheriff's department, set up a Ballot Security Program. The signs referred to here were posted in precincts around Dallas County, some in north Dallas, which is a predominately white area of Dallas County; some in South Oak Cliff, a predominately black area. Questions were raised about the signs. The Dallas County Democratic chairman filed a lawsuit naming nine people in relation to the signs. Sid Fitzwater was among the nine but was dropped before the suit went to court. Ultimately, the suit was thrown out of Federal court. The district attorney of Dallas County, who is a partisan Democrat, in response to complaints about the sign, held an investigation and set up a grand jury. I quote from a letter, which I will submit for the RECORD, that was sent to the committee, to Senator STROM THURMOND, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, on January 29 of this year. This is from the DA's office and I remind you the DA of Dallas County is a Democrat:

I can tell you that the signs appeared not only in some south Dallas precincts but also in some north Dallas ones; and that there was no evidence that the signs were placed in the polling places specifically to intimidate or disenfranchise voters. This office concluded that there was no evidence of violation of the Texas Penal Code or the Federal Election Code.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DALLAS COUNTY,
DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Dallas, TX, January 29, 1986.

Re investigation of the 1982 general election in Dallas County.

Senator STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee, Washington, DC, (Attention: Frank Klonoski).

DEAR MR. KLONOSKI: Pursuant to your telephone request of January 21, 1986, I am writing this letter to confirm the investigation of the 1982 General Election in Dallas County, conducted by this office and the Dallas County Grand Jury, specifically as regards the placing of warning signs in a number of Dallas County polling places. The placing of those signs was one (1) of eighteen (18) matters subject to a seven (7) month investigation by this office, culminating in a lengthy review by the Grand Jury which ended on July 1, 1983; the Grand Jury declined to return indictments or take any action on any of the eighteen (18) matters.

This office decided to investigate the sign postings after receiving several complaints alleging that the signs, which warned voters that they could be imprisoned for violating the Texas Election Code (e.g., voting twice, electioneering, influencing other voters, etc.), were placed in South Dallas precincts specifically to intimidate and disenfranchise minority voters. While I cannot discuss the specifics of our investigation, I can tell you that the signs appeared not only in some South Dallas precincts, but also in some North Dallas ones; and that there was no evidence that the signs were placed in the polling places specifically to intimidate or disenfranchise voters. This office concluded that there was no violation of the Texas Penal Code or the Texas Election Code (which in fact neither permits nor prohibits such signs). And as I said before, the Grand Jury took no action on the matter.

I wish I could be more detailed in this letter, but State law prohibits the disclosure of all proceedings held before the Grand Jury, including the testimony and evidence presented to it. If you require anything further, please advise.

Sincerely,

THEODORE P. STEINKE, Jr.,
Assistant District Attorney.

Mr. GRAMM. Now, Mr. President, let me get back to Sid Fitzwater. Sid Fitzwater was an honor graduate as an undergraduate. He was a star law student. He was associate editor of the Baylor Law Review. He was a top affirmative speaker not only in Texas, but in the Southwest Conference. He was State champion in the moot court. He was a brilliant student, as will be attested by some of the quotes I will give you later. He become the youngest district judge in the history of Texas. In rating of our judges carried on by the Dallas Bar Association in Texas, members who practice before the court are asked to rate Federal, State, and county judges as to their qualities. In the last bar poll that was held, 97 percent of the respondents said that Sid Fitzwater was an outstanding judge. That was not only the highest rating in Dallas County but that is the highest overall rating to my knowledge that any judge has ever received on a bar poll.

There were four areas where judges were rated in that poll. "Is he hard working?" Ninety-eight percent said Sid Fitzwater is hard working. To my knowledge, that is the highest rating in that area ever received by a judge at any level in the history of Texas. "Is he impartial?" Ninety-seven percent said yes. "Does he correctly apply the law?" Ninety-five percent said yes. "Does he demonstrate proper judicial temperament and demeanor?" Ninety-seven percent says yes. To the best of my knowledge, those are the highest ratings ever received on each individual part of those polls.

Let me read you what the Honorable Jon Sparling, Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, says about Sid Fitzwater:

I would give Judge Fitzwater the very highest marks for his ability as a judge.

Judge Abner V. McCall, president emeritus of Baylor University and former dean of the Baylor Law School, says:

His extraordinary record as a district judge warranted his appointment to the Federal bench. His character and conduct are excellent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. GRAMM. I ask for 2 more minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, how much time have we left?

Mr. THURMOND. Two more minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. I thank the Chair.

Charles Smith, president of the State Bar of Texas, says:

He is far more mature than his chronological age. He has the ability to combine his intelligence with great insight into the law * * * able to handle complicated matters.

Cullen Smith, former president of the State Bar of Texas and former member of the house of delegates of the ABA and chairman of the general practice session, says:

Uniquely qualified. An opportunity for the country to have a truly outstanding U.S. district judge.

I submit, Mr. President, that Sid Fitzwater is an outstanding jurist. He can be an outstanding Federal judge. He has keen intellect and he has the character to go with it. I do not understand how all of this opposition built up almost overnight. Perhaps it was the fact that Sid Fitzwater will be the youngest Federal judge. Perhaps it was the fact that several people in Texas, including myself, when the nomination came forward, said that with this man's keen intellect, ability and character perhaps he will some day be on the Supreme Court. Maybe it was the article written about his youth.

Mr. SIMON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. SIMON. Let me just say I sat through the hearings on this particular nominee. I think the opposition grows out of a mistake. The Senator and I differ on whether it was a mistake, a mistake he made in posting the signs. I think the fundamental question is, Is there any indication of a pattern of racism on the part of this judge, because beyond any question outside of that he is outstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

There is 18 minutes remaining to the side of the proponents.

Mr. THURMOND. I yield the Senator 2 more minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SIMON. I come to the conclusion that there is no such pattern and that the real question is a question of judgment: Should he be denied a Federal judgeship because of this one mistake? My conclusion, after having sat in on the hearings—and I went in, frankly, expecting to vote against Judge Fitzwater—is that it would be a mistake on the basis of one mistake, posting three signs in one precinct, to deny this man a Federal judgeship.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. GRAMM. I thank the Senator from Illinois, and I want to thank him for the leadership he has taken on this issue and for the courage he has shown, and I greatly appreciate it. I will never forget it.

Mr. McCONNELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCONNELL. I might say to my friend from Texas and to others that Senator SIMON and I, as the least senior members of the Judiciary Committee, other than our chairman, probably spend more time listening to nomination hearings than anyone. I sat through virtually all of the hearings, as did Senator SIMON, on Judge Fitzwater. I want to echo what the Senator from Illinois said. There is absolutely no evidence whatsoever of any racial prejudice on the part of Judge Fitzwater, and even if the posting of the one sign was a mistake, as my friend from Illinois believes it to be, the question arises, as he said, whether that is sufficient to deny this outstanding lawyer a seat on the Federal District Court of Texas. It obviously is not a mistake. I think it was not a mistake. Even if it were, it does not rise to the level of denying him a seat on the court. He is the most outstanding nominee for the Federal bench I have heard in my 15 months on the committee.

Lost in all this is the frustration that many feel in the difficulty of getting a fair election in some of the precincts of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. THURMOND. I yield 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCONNELL. I am absolutely convinced, having listened to the testimony before our committee, that this project in 1982, whether or not it was ill-advised, was not for any evil purpose. It was designed to try to ensure a fair election.

For those of us who have tried to compete in the South as Republicans, I might say that in many areas of the South it is extremely difficult to get a fair election, and it has nothing whatsoever to do with race. It has to do with the absence of a two-party system. In those areas of the South and other parts of the country where there is an essential lack of a two-party system, the opportunity to engage in election day shenanigans is most available.

It is clear to me, from listening to the testimony, that what the effort was in 1982 in Texas was to try to do the best job possible in ensuring a fair election, that it was totally unrelated to the question of race.

I think it would be a great tragedy to deny this confirmation to this fine young lawyer and judge from Texas, who, as I said, I found the most outstanding nominee we have had before our committee, for district judge, in the 15 months I have been a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GRAMM. I thank the distinguished Senator.

I know there are a lot of pressures and a lot of groups writing letters, but a large number of those people do not know Sid Fitzwater and do not know his record.

I urge my colleagues to vote for cloture and, if we prevail on cloture, to vote to confirm the nomination of Sid Fitzwater. Look at his overall record, vote for cloture, and vote for the nomination of Sidney Fitzwater.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the nomination.

The question has been put in terms, it was just put that way a few moments ago by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, whether Mr. Fitzwater should be denied a Federal judgeship. I only observe that an individual is not entitled to a Federal judgeship. The question shall be, what is there in your record that raises you to the quality and to the level that you ought to go on the Federal bench for a lifetime appointment? It is in light of that question that the activities of Mr. Fitzwater should be viewed as the Senate considers this nomination.

Unfortunately, the committee, as I understand it, has neither given us a report nor has printed the hearings, which seems to me reason enough to vote against cloture; postpone the vote so that we could get from the committee the printed hearings and a report.

These are important nominations, and to bring them to the Senate in this manner, without the normal printed record behind the nominee, it seems to me, is to place us in the posture in which we cannot fully meet our responsibilities.

With respect to this sign that has been displayed here, the sign which the nominee posted in a Dallas block precinct, there has been a lot of argument as to whether the statements therein are accurate statements of Texas law. From where I am standing, and I am some 10 yards from that sign, I cannot read those statements printed in black which are supposed to reflect Texas law. However, I submit that the question of the sign is larger than whether it accurately reflects Texas law.

Suppose you had a huge sign that only said in huge red letters as this one does in part: "You can be imprisoned," "Don't risk it. Obey the law." That is all it said. So there is no question about whether you are stating the law accurately or not. A huge sign, huge, red letters: "You can be imprisoned. Don't risk it. Obey the law."

Then you run around posting those signs in minority precincts, in areas of the country where there has been a history of intimidation of the voters. You mean to tell me that is not intimidation of the voters? How much common sense does one need to know what the perception of that tactic would be.

This tactic was used in New Jersey in the 1981 election and reported in the Texas papers prior to this 1982 election. The same tactics were used in Maryland in 1984, including hiring security guards from private agencies to go to the polling places in minority areas and sort of move around—with large ballot protection buttons on and signs posted—all I submit, designed to intimidate the voters.

Other judges in this Dallas election, as I understand it—refused to post these signs, refused to do so. They recognized that the signs were improper and should not be put up. Fitzwater went back to his own precinct, as I understand it. No signs had been put up in his precinct which was not a minority precinct. He did not post the signs in his own precinct, even though there were not any signs on display there. Why did he not do that?

So I submit that anyone who does not appreciate the sensitivity of this issue—we are talking about the most basic right in our democracy, and that is the right to vote. This sign, in my judgment, represents a clear effort to intimidate voters.

Every jurisdiction has an election machinery to run honest elections. If you have a problem with the conduct of the election, that is where it ought to be taken, right to the people who are charged with running the election.

Even Brad Reynolds of the Department of Justice wrote a letter to the Texas election people about these signs, questioning them.

Fitzwater is 32 years old. He ought to prove himself over time to live down this activity, not ask us now to discount it, ignore it, barely 3 to 4 years after it occurred.

If confirmed, he is going to be ruling on voting rights cases on that Federal district bench. This is a lifetime appointment. No one is entitled to this appointment. You have to bring to it a record that proves you reflect the values and sensitivities essential to serving as a member of the Federal judiciary. I can think of no value more important than protecting and safeguarding the people's right to vote; and the use of this sign, in and of itself, should be grounds to reject this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time remains on each side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 7½ minutes remaining. The Senator from South Carolina has 13 minutes and 50 seconds remaining.

Who yields time? If neither side yields time, the time will be charged equally.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would have thought that after that excellent presentation of my colleague and friend from Maryland, there would have been some response, particularly since those who support the nomination have twice as much time. We have a number of speakers. I yield the remaining time to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield 7 minutes to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENNEDY. Five minutes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, let us not kid ourselves about this vote today. The vote on Mr. Fitzwater is a vote having to do strictly with the issue of civil rights. It does not have anything to do with the question of Mr. Fitzwater's qualifications.

You would have come to the conclusion, having heard the distinguished Senator from Texas speak, that Mr. Fitzwater had a great rating with members of the bar in Texas.

That just is not so. The American Bar Association rated him: "A majority of our committee is of the opinion that Judge Fitzwater was qualified for this appointment." The minority found him to be not qualified.

But the fact is not one single member of the Bar Association committee found him to be well qualified, which is a rating available. Not one found him very well qualified. No. He just got a majority qualified and a minority not qualified.

Here is a young man 32 years of age who has the audacity to go into the minority wards and post this particular sign with big red letters "You can be imprisoned."

He knew what he was doing. Three other judges refused to do it. No, he insisted that he was going to go out and post those signs and intimidate the voters in this area.

I think the attorney general of Texas states it very well when he said, "There is no doubt in my mind that the signs were placed there to intimidate minority voters."

That is the sum and substance of it. It is not a difficult question to talk about. It is a very clearcut case and if Mr. Fitzwater had come before our committee and said, "I made a mistake; I shouldn't have done it," that would have been one thing. But, no, he did not do that when he came before the committee. He came before the committee, and when Senator BIDEN asked him "Why do you think you are getting all these questions? Do you think it is political," he said, "Yes, I think these questions are merely political."

Many of us on the committee and in this body have voted for people with whom we disagree. I have myself time and time again. It is not a question of political philosophy. It is a question of legal integrity. It is a question of whether or not a man who has the audacity to post a sign of this kind to intimidate voters belongs on the Federal bench with a lifetime appointment.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. When he went out and posted the signs, was he already a member of the judiciary?

Mr. METZENBAUM. He certainly was.

Mr. SARBANES. So there was a judge running around posting signs down in the precinct with huge red letters, "You can be imprisoned"; is that it?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator is absolutely correct.

What kind of a man is this who wants to be a Federal judge for a lifetime appointment?

I say to my colleagues that I hear some of you are going to vote for cloture and then vote against him. We do not have to kid each other. If you vote for cloture and then vote against him, that is not the meaningful vote. The votes are here. Everybody who feels Mr. Fitzwater should not be confirmed should stand up and vote against cloture. The critical vote is the vote on cloture.

I say to my colleagues if you do not believe Mr. Fitzwater belongs on the bench and you are going to eventually vote against him, then the correct vote is to vote no on cloture.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 3 minutes and 11 seconds and the Senator from South Carolina has 13 minutes and 50 seconds remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. Since there are no further speakers on behalf of this nominee, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, under our constitutional system, great deference ought to be given and should be given to the nominees of the President for the Federal bench. In this respect the Senator from Colorado is a constitutional conservative. That conservatism extends to those who might happen to share heavily the President's ideology.

We are not here today, those of us opposing this nomination, doing so because this man happens to be a conservative or even for that matter has reflected in his political or judicial life the ideological values of even an extreme element of conservatism.

The question is one of judgment.

The constitutional deference given the President in his appointees for the Cabinet and particularly for the Federal bench do not extend to the point where the Senate is to give its automatic ratification for the appointee who has poor judgment. That is exactly why we have a confirmation process.

This man by his actions as a member of the bench has not demonstrated the judicial quality of judgment which is the essence of the job that he is being put forward for.

Mr. President, as a general rule, I believe that in the matter of judicial appointments, a President should be allowed to exercise his best judgment. Naturally, from time to time, judges will reflect the ideology of those by whom they are appointed. In the absence of evidence that such nominees are otherwise unsuited for service, I generally believe that we should approve the President's choice.

The nomination of Sidney Fitzwater places this body in a different situation. There are times, Mr. President, when we are called on to carefully consider specific factors in a nominee's background to determine whether he possesses the prerequisites we deem vital to discharge the responsibilities of the Federal judiciary.

Mr. President, I oppose Mr. Fitzwater's nomination because I believe he has failed to exhibit the level of sensitivity and maturity of judgment we must insist upon in one who would be entrusted with a lifetime judicial appointment.

In 1982, while serving as a judge of the Texas State court, Mr. Fitzwater personally posted signs in minority polling places which served to intimidate and discourage prospective voters.

The language of these signs Mr. President, implied that a voter could be imprisoned for accepting transportation to the polls, or for attempting to influence a voter to support a specific candidate.

Mr. President, each of us sits in the U.S. Senate precisely because we were more successful than our opponents in influencing a majority of the electorate to support us. I suspect Mr. President, that a good number of us also worked to assure that citizens wishing to cast their ballots received transportation to the polls to do so.

Our constitutional duty is clear. We simply cannot elevate a person to the Federal bench who, neither independently delved into the accuracy of these signs, nor seemed concerned about their implications.

And what of Mr. Fitzwater's judgment Mr. President? What about those intangibles that contribute to the quality we call judicial temperament? Mr. Fitzwater testified that he read the sign at least five different times. Five times Mr. President, and not once did he conclude that posting such material was inappropriate behavior for a State court judge.

Mr. President, Judge Fitzwater's lack of judgment reflects poorly on his understanding of the first amendment and his understanding of the basic right of citizens to vote in a democracy. In light of the shameful reasons which necessitated Federal voting rights protections; given the long history of minority voter harassment; and given the gross misstatement of the law contained in the signs he posted, Judge Fitzwater has demonstrated that he is unfit for service on the Federal bench.

Mr. President, condemnation of Mr. Fitzwater's actions has come from all quarters and has been nonpartisan. Even the Justice Department, speaking through William Bradford Reynolds—a man not easily accused of voting rights activism—was "concerned that no nonracial justification" had been offered for placing most of the signs at minority precincts.

Mr. President, less than a month ago we celebrated a democratic revolution in the Phillippines. We gloried in televised images of average citizens protecting ballot boxes with their very lives. We understood the yearning of the Filippino people for the fair and unfettered exercise of the right to vote.

Mr. President, the people of the United States demand no less. We cannot afford to be an anemic democracy. Our judiciary must be composed of men and women who zealously cling to the idea of full enfranchisement.

There is no place in such a judiciary, Mr. President, for a judge who warns minority citizens that they can be imprisoned for participation in the political process.

I must oppose this nomination. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting against the confirmation of Sidney Fitzwater.

Mr. DOLE. it is my intention to vote for cloture and, if cloture is invoked and we proceed to a final vote, for the confirmation of Sidney Fitzwater to be U.S. judge for the district of north Texas.

Judge Fitzwater was born in Olney, MD, and received both his B.A. and J.D. degrees from Baylor University in Texas. He has several years experience in the practice of the law, having been associated with the firm of Vinson and Elkins in Houston from 1976–78, and a member of the firm of Rain, Harrell, Emery, and Doke in Dallas from 1978–82. In April of 1982, he was appointed to be a district judge in Dallas County, in which capacity he has served until the present time. In 1983, he received the highest overall performance rating of any Federal, State, or county judge in the Dallas metropolitan area.

Because this young man has solid credentials and a distinguished record as a county district judge, I have decided to support his nomination notwithstanding the fact that one very serious issue has arisen in connection with his nomination. That issue, of course, is his involvement in the posting of signs in minority precincts in Dallas County during the 1982 elections. These signs inaccurately represented Texas election law and could very well have had the effect of discouraging minorities from voting.

I believe Judge Fitzwater should have questioned the posting of the signs, but he was only 29 at the time and was himself in a position of vulnerability and inexperience. He had only been appointed district judge a few months before, was up for election himself, and was asked to post the signs by a senior judge in the county. Moreover, I accept his statements that he was told the signs were going to be posted throughout Dallas County and had no knowledge of the fact that they would appear mainly in minority areas. The Justice Department, of course, subsequently found that most of the signs were placed in predominantly minority precincts and that no nonracial explanation had been proffered by county elections officials for the incident.

Judge Fitzwater made an error in judgment. The question is whether this single incident justifies a vote against his confirmation, given his otherwise clean record and solid credentials. I don't believe it does. As Senator SIMON pointed out in speaking in favor of the nomination last week, during the hearings, Judge Fitzwater expressed appreciation and understanding of why there could be legitimate and serious concern about the incident and assured all Senators that if he had known all the facts, he would not have complied with instructions to post the signs. Judge Fitzwater's testimony also reflected sensitivity to the problem of racial discrimination and strong commitment to the principle of civil rights and equal opportunity.

As a consequence, I have decided to vote for the nominee, though I would not call my decision an easy one. Based on the overall record, however, I am convinced that Judge Fitzwater has the qualifications and temperament to be an outstanding judge who is committed to the fair and equal administration of justice for all our Nation's citizens.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the nomination of Sidney Fitzwater to fill a vacancy in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas. The record of Mr. Fitzwater's confirmation hearing raises serious questions about his commitment to civil rights and his judgment that cannot go unchallenged.

In 1982 Mr. Fitzwater, a Republican judicial candidate and a sitting State judge, posted three signs outside polling precincts in south Dallas the day before elections. He said he believed that the signs would be posted throughout Dallas, not just in the predominately black south Dallas. He also said he believed that the signs had been approved by the Texas secretary of state. In fact, 90 percent of the signs posted were in predominately black neighborhoods, and the Texas secretary of state had not approved their content.

According to the record, Mr. Fitzwater knew that the sign posting was a purely partisan effort, and that all three of the signs which he posted were in minority neighborhoods. Mr. Fitzwater had read one of the signs five times and knew, or should have known, that the signs were misleading and misstated the law of Texas. He should have known that a voter cannot be imprisoned merely for influencing another person's vote, as the signs said.

He should have known that this warning could be directed at election officials only, not voters, and that it could intimidate persons and promote fear that one risked imprisonment by voting. As an attorney and as a judge, he should have known that the net effect of such fear would be that fewer properly registered voters would choose to vote. Yet even when Mr. Fitzwater went to vote the next day, and observed that his precinct did not have such signs posted, he was not moved to investigate the sign postings, nor even to question their propriety.

Mr. President, a Federal judge is a guardian of the law. To facilitate this great responsibility, the Constitution provides for the lifetime appointment of Federal judges. This lifetime appointment protects the judge from outside pressures, and increases the likelihood that he will weigh all evidence equally and act independently of special interests in favor of the general interest. Consequently, absent ethical misconduct or impeachment proceedings, the Senate's advice and consent function is the last time a nominated judge will be scrutinized for his fitness to sit. We should not take this responsibility lightly.

What, then, should be our threshold requirements for a nominee for a Federal judge position? First, the nominee should conduct himself or herself in a manner suitable to one in such a position. Canon 2 of the "Code of Judicial Conduct," which addresses the appropriate conduct of a judge, states:

A Judge Should Avoid Impropriety and the Appearance of Impropriety in All His Activities.

This canon recognizes that since a judge sits in judgment of others he or she should strive to live by the highest ethical standards to encourage respect for the court's decisions and the law in general. In contrast, Mr. Fitzwater's decision to post the signs not only did not avoid the appearance of impropriety, but also may have constituted an impropriety itself.

That all criminal charges have been dropped against Mr. Fitzwater is not grounds for his exoneration in the light that we must view his activity. A prudent judge would have made further inquiry into both the authorization to post the signs and their legal content. Several of Mr. Fitzwater's colleagues did take these steps. Mr. Fitzwater did not, and therefore failed to meet those ethical standards expected of a judge.

A second threshold requirement for a nominee is that he or she possess sound legal analytical skills and mature judgment. A judge must be the arbiter in disputes among persons and between a person and the state, and must be able to identify all sides of an issue and render a decision based on well-reasoned and mature judgment. It is my belief that Mr. Fitzwater's judgment in posting those signs was neither mature nor well-reasoned. Mr. Fitzwater's conduct demonstrated a profound insensitivity to a genuine problem, a problem that threatens the integrity of each and every election in this country.

Voter intimidation is not a problem of the past, but a national problem that I saw and fought back in 1981 during a gubernatorial campaign in New Jersey. A judge who mistakenly acts on the assumption that voter intimidation no longer exists is like a criminal defendant who claims ignorance of the law as a defense. Insensitivity to ethically improper conduct should not be accepted from a person nominated for a Federal judgeship.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Judge Sidney A. Fitzwater for the Federal District Court of the Northern District of Texas. Judge Fitzwater is truly an accomplished lawyer and an outstanding jurist. He is known for his intellectual ability, his analytical mind, and his clarity of expression.

Educated at Baylor University, he received his B.A. degree in 1975. Participating in Baylor's special 3-3 program, he entered law school in what ordinarily would have been his senior year and graduated from the Baylor University School of Law in 1976, already demonstrating that he was a remarkable young man.

He joined a prominent Dallas law firm in 1976, and then moved to a more prestigious firm in 1978, where he worked until his appointment to the Texas district court in 1982. He has served with distinction as a Texas State judge from that date forward until the present day.

Judge Fitzwater's nomination was widely acclaimed by his peers. That is a remarkable achievement for a man who is the youngest State district judge in the history of Texas. He has had a remarkable career ranging from State debate champion to law student to successful attorney and then to State district judge.

While Judge Fitzwater is young, let us older folks not hold it against him. His youth makes the ABA approval of his qualifications even more compelling.

During his nomination hearings, Judge Fitzwater certainly impressed this member of the Judiciary Committee with his intelligence and his legal reasoning.

Allegations have been made against Judge Fitzwater of either covert prejudice or lack of judicial maturity due to his approval of signs posted in low-income Dallas wards during the 1982 election. Judge Fitzwater has been completely absolved of any wrongdoing or even of misjudgment by competent legal authorities in Texas. In fact, in May 1983, the plantiffs agreed by consent to voluntarily drop the lawsuit brought against Judge Fitzwater and other officials in Texas. Shortly thereafter, the U.S. district court dismissed the entire lawsuit for lack of standing and lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

The signs in question were cleared by the Texas secretary of state and by the Dallas County sheriff. And Judge Fitzwater has testified that he thought the signs were being distributed throughout the county.

Theodore Steinke, the assistant district attorney in Dallas County has stated that the signs in question "appeared not only in some south Dallas precincts, but also in some north Dallas ones, and that there was no evidence that the signs were placed in the polling places specifically to intimidate or disenfranchise voters."

Allegations have been made that the signs were in violation of the law, however, the assistant district attorney concluded after a thorough study of this matter, that "there was no violation of the Texas Penal Code or the Texas Election Code which, in fact, neither permits nor prohibits such signs."

Allegations have also been made that the signs were designed to intimidate minority voters at the polling place. Judge Fitzwater has stated under oath that he thought two particular items on the signs were directed at election officers and under no circumstances was he attempting to intimidate voters.

The former prosecutor of Dallas County and several leading members of the bar from the Democratic Party have written to the Judiciary Committee attesting to Judge Fitzwater's probity, integrity, and juristic ability. He comes highly recommended by all who have come in contact with him.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that Judge Fitzwater is an unusual young man who has the support of his peers and his community for the important and demanding position of Federal district judge. He shows great promise of being an outstanding Federal jurist. It is my pleasure to join in support of this talented and able young man. I recommend approval without qualification and with enthusiasm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

If no one yields time the time runs equally.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator BIDEN, is on his way over here. There is only 1 minute remaining. He would like to be able to address this issue.

I think all of us are aware that under the rules of procedure we can get a quorum call and eat up the time.

I would hope that perhaps those in support of the amendment would speak and then permit the ranking minority member to do so. Out of deference to his position, I would hope we can get that degree of accommodation. I am not trying to delay the vote.

Mr. THURMOND. How much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has 14 minutes remaining and the Senator from Massachusetts has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. THURMOND. Out of courtesy to the distinguished Senator from Delaware, Senator BIDEN, I will stop and allow him to speak when he comes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this administration has appointed this man to be a judge on the Federal district court for the Northern District of Texas. His name is Sidney Fitzwater.

He was investigated by the FBI, he was investigated by the administration, and found to be competent and qualified and therefore they submitted his name to be appointed.

Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee has investigated him. We have thorough investigators on the committee. As chairman of that committee I do not want any judge, regardless of who he is, Republican, Democrat, Independent, or what not, to be appointed or confirmed unless he is a man of character and ability and who is fair in his dealings with his fellow man. Our investigators found this man qualified.

If you are against someone politically, who you do not agree should be a judge, you can find some reason to be against him. No better reason has been given here to turn this man down.

This man graduated from Baylor University in 1975 and Baylor Law School in 1976. He practiced in Houston and Dallas for 6 years. This very judge received the highest overall performance rating of any Federal, State, or county judge in Dallas County in 1983.

Is this a recommendation? How are they going to answer that? You Senators who oppose this man, how are you going to answer this? Get up and answer it. How are you going to answer this man, when the bar out there gave him the highest rating of any Federal, State, or county judge in Dallas County?

Now, Mr. President, he has served as a judge of the 298th judicial district in Dallas County from 1982 to the present. That is 4 years. If there is something wrong with this man, if he is biased, if he discriminates, certainly the people would have found it out. How was he selected? Was he appointed by someone? No. He was elected by the people. The people elected him. That is the reason that a judge has to get out when he runs before the people and operate as a politician to a certain extent to get elected.

Reference was made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio here that the ABA barely approved him. The ABA held him qualified. Why did not they give him a little better rating of well qualified? Because he was so young and did not have so much experience. He had had 9 years practicing law. The ABA requires 12 years to get the highest rating. Is not that a commendation to him, that this man who had not practiced but 9 years was found qualified by the American Bar Association in spite of their guidelines that they required 12 years? They thought highly of him, so highly of this judge, that they approved him even though he had not practiced but 9 years when their guidelines required 12 years.

It is ridiculous to turn this man down. Do you want to destroy a man's reputation, a young man like this, who was voted the finest judge in Dallas County of all the judges Federal, State, and county, turn him down for what? Why would you turn him down?

Oh, the only thing up here is the fact he puts up a few signs. What do these signs say? The signs merely repeat the law of Texas on elections. Is there anything wrong with that? This sign he puts up is the law of Texas. It would be good to put in every place and precinct in these United States to let people see what the law is on elections.

Here is what the sign said: "If you offer or accept or agree to offer or accept money or anything else of value to vote or not to vote, you can be imprisoned." Why should they not know that? Maybe some people do not know that.

You can be imprisoned:

If you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts says you have a right to influence people—but not at the polling precincts, not within so many feet of that voting box. That is the law of Texas.

If you vote without being registered.

Well, should they not know that? Some people do try to vote without being registered. They have been caught and punished for that. That is the law of Texas.

If you let a person vote more than once.

And some people in Texas have had a reputation, I understand, for voting more than once. Some very vital elections have been carried out this way.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am not yielding until I am finished. You have had your time; I have mine now.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would you yield about the question about the legality in Texas?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am not yielding, I said.

Mr. METZENBAUM. OK.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, "If you vote with someone else's registration."

Well, that is against the law. That is the law of Texas, is it not, I say to Senator GRAMM?

Mr. GRAMM. It certainly is.

Mr. THURMOND. "Violate Texas Election Code or Texas Penal Code."

That is all the sign says. That sign back there that they are trying to use to keep him from being a Federal judge merely quotes the law of Texas. And what is wrong with that? It is a good law. It prevents fraud in elections, instills honesty in elections. What honest man can object to that?

If you are against the man, of course, you can find some reason to be against him. You do not want Mr. Reagan to appoint him, that is the whole thing.

Mr. President, even a Democratic chairman out there in 1982, the Democratic chairman—and these are Democrats who are raising this question about it—listen to what he said:

I would like to advise the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the United States of my complete, total support for President Reagan's nomination of the State district judge Sid Fitzwater to the Federal district bench of the Northern District of Texas, Dallas division.

Who is he? The Democratic chairman. He is an honest man and he gave his statement in an unbiased way here.

It has come to my attention that some people believe that Judge Fitzwater's political activities somehow detract from his ability and competence to be a Federal district judge.

Now, listen to this:

I believe I can speak to both because in 1982, I was chairman of the Democratic Party of Dallas County and since Judge Fitzwater's appointment and selection to the State district court, I have practiced in his court and tried lawsuits before him.

While I in no way agree with the tactics of the Republicans during the 1982 election, in my opinion Judge Fitzwater's connection with it was so infinitesimal that it certainly has no bearing and no relationship to his competence and his ability to be a Federal district judge.

"Although I am a partisan Democrat"—these are his words—"I would like to stand in front of the committee and urge you"—he came before our committee, came here in person and testified for this man, the Democratic Party chairman—"and urge you to support the President's nomination and confirm Judge Fitzwater to this extremely important judicial position."

Then he winds up his testimony by saying:

I think he deserves the appointment and warrants the confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I do not believe the Democratic chairman would have come here and gotten on the witness stand in the U.S. Senate and made those kinds of statements if he felt that Mr. Fitzwater was a bigot or favored discrimination or was incompetent or not qualified to be a judge.

Mr. President, I want to say further that this matter was investigated in Texas when somebody raised a point about it. The Assistant District Attorney, Chief, Public Integrity Section, investigated it and here is what he found:

I am writing this letter to confirm the investigation of the 1982 general election in Dallas County, conducted by this office and the Dallas County grand jury, specifically as regards the placing of warning signs in a number of Dallas County polling places. The placing of those signs was one of 18 matters subject to a 7-month investigation by this office, culminating in a lengthy review by the grand jury which ended on July 1, 1983; the grand jury declined to return indictments or take any action on any of the 18 matters.

This office decided to investigate the sign postings after receiving several complaints alleging that the signs, which warned voters that they could be imprisoned for violating the Texas election code (e.g., voting twice, electioneering, influencing other voters, etc.) were placed in south Dallas precincts specifically to intimidate and disenfranchise minority voters. While I cannot discuss the specifics of our investigations, I can tell you that the signs appeared not only—the signs appeared not only in south Dallas precincts, but also in some north Dallas ones;

This was investigated in Texas. Are some Senators going to come here and try to take this matter out of the hands of the investigators? Here is what he said, the head of the investigation in Dallas County. He says:

I can tell you that the signs appeared not only in some south Dallas precincts, but also in some north Dallas ones; and that there was no evidence that the signs were placed in the polling places specifically to intimidate or disenfranchise voters. This office concluded that there was no violation of the Texas penal code or the Texas election code (which in fact neither permits nor prohibits such signs). And as I said before, the grand jury took no action on the matter.

So you had the FBI investigate him, you had the Judiciary Committee investigators investigate him, you had the Public Integrity Section down in Texas investigate him, and they all have given him a clean record. Well, what else could you want?

Now, is this going to be just a matter of fighting a Reagan appointment or are you going to give him an honest, fair hearing, and an honest vote in the Senate?

I understand the distinguished Senator from Delaware is here now. I believe he has 1 minute left and I want to give him a chance to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would ask to suspend the running of the time for a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts has 58 seconds left. The Senator from South Carolina has 1 minute and 40 seconds left. I would like to inquire of the two managers, against whose time is the Senator from Delaware being charged?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields the remaining time of the Senator from Massachusetts to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I intend to vote against the nomination of Sidney Fitzwater to be a U.S. District Court judge and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

The major issue in contention here, is that during the 1982 elections Mr. Fitzwater, then a sitting State court judge and himself a candidate for election, posted signs which clearly could have had the effect of intimidating minority voters at balloting locations in minority precincts. Although I am of the opinion that Sidney Fitzwater is intelligent and has a record of professional competence as a State trial court judge in Texas, I believe his actions in this sensitive situation failed to demonstrate the independence of thought or judgment which are essential for a Federal court nominee.

Two fundamental questions have been raised concerning Mr. Fitzwater's temperament and judgment. First, is he sufficiently impartial and sensitive to the implications of posting those signs in minority precincts in light of the historic struggle of racial minorities against voter intimidation and harassment? Second, was Mr. Fitzwater's posting of signs in minority precincts an appropriate act for a sitting judge?

I attended Mr. Fitzwater's confirmation hearing and listened to and questioned him at length, as well as those witnesses who supported and opposed his confirmation. Based on the record of that hearing, I have concluded that Mr. Fitzwater did not appreciate, either in 1982 when he posted those signs, or today, the impact his actions might have had on minority voters.

It is also clear that the signs contained inaccurate, or at the very least, misleading statements of Texas law. The list of prohibited activities on the signs included accepting anything of value to vote or not to vote, and trying to influence a voter how to vote. It is, of course, common practice to provide rides to the polls or to encourage voter participation. And the suggestion, as stated in the text of the signs, that a voter cannot try to influence another voter is certainly a violation of one of the most fundamental principles of free and democratic elections.

Mr. Fitzwater's posting of such signs compromised the public perception that judges and courts are a forum for the fair, unbiased, and impartial adjudication of disputes. His actions stand in marked contrast to the judgment of several of his colleagues who refused to post the signs because it was not an appropriate thing for a judge to do.

Mr. Fitzwater testified that he had no hesitation in complying with a request made by an influential senior judge that he post the signs in three minority precincts. Although he acknowleged that he personally read the signs several times, he did not question the propriety of such activity at the time and he adhered to this position during his confirmation hearing before the Judiciary Committee. His testimony indicates that he felt he had been absolved of any independent responsibility for these actions by virtue of the fact that others had deemed the signs to be appropriate. He displayed little appreciation for the meaning which might be imputed to the signs or for the history of voting rights denials which might color a potential voter's reaction to the presence of such signs at a polling place.

Mr. President, a Federal district court judge holds a position of unique stature and trust in our society. These judges are called upon to be the initial arbiters of disputes over the most basic rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. In the first instance, a district court judge establishes the ground rules for litigation of a case and makes many rulings which are never reviewed by the appellate courts. It is said by many that there is no power so great as that which resides within the courtroom of a Federal district court judge. It is for that reason that I believe judgment and temperament to be essential qualities in evaluating a nominee for that position.

In the case of Sidney Fitzwater, it is not his youth or inexperience which troubles me. It is, rather, his inability to demonstrate that he understands the implications of his actions, as they affected the right of minorities to cast their vote. Any nominee for a Federal judgeship must be cognizant of the history of voting rights violations which has marred our Nation's history. With voting rights disputes a major issue of Federal jurisdiction, he must demonstrate an understanding of the central importance of voting rights to our democratic system.

In dealing with matters of such consequence, Mr. Fitzwater failed to exercise the necessary judgment or temperament to qualify him to serve in the special and trusted position of a Federal court judge.

Mr. President, let me respond to the last statement made by the Senator from South Carolina. The question is, what violation? The violation that was committed here was a violation of good judgment, sound judgment, and judicial temperament; not whether or not the man is a criminal and committed a crime, but whether or not he should have had the good sense to avoid being involved in what is a scam.

I should point out to you that the Texas Legislature, following this incident, passed overwhelmingly a provision saying, "You can't do that any more." It is now Texas law.

The question becomes whether or not a man should be elevated to the Federal court who has shown the lack of good judgment that other members on the bench with whom he served concluded they should not participate in.

I can see the Chair is about to raise the gavel. My time must be up. I urge my colleagues to vote against Mr. Fitzwater and the cloture motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time has expired.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the able Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Summing up, after listening to the debate for an hour, I think it is important to understand what is at issue here. Judge Sid Fitzwater placed signs in 1 precinct out of approximately 300 precincts in Dallas County—1 precinct out of approximately 300 precincts in Dallas County. Subsequently, a lawsuit was filed surrounding the posting of those signs. Judge Fitzwater was dismissed, and that is it.

There is simply nothing else to the opposition to this outstanding nominee. One precinct out of 300, a subsequent lawsuit, dismissal as against Judge Fitzwater and others, and that is it. That is the totality of the case against this nominee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, it would be an outrage for the Senate to fail to confirm this outstanding young man for the Federal bench based on this total lack of evidence of any impropriety.

I urge the Senate to confirm this nomination.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifteen seconds remain to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I want to say in closing that I hope the Senators will vote cloture, and give the Senate a chance to vote in this body so the majority can control this matter.

They cannot control it unless we get cloture. I hope they will vote cloture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point responses to questions by Judge Fitzwater at his hearing on February 5, 1986.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

During his hearing on February 5, 1986, Judge Fitzwater responded to several questions concerning his involvement in the posting of warning signs at polling places. His responses to these questions were as follows:

1. Question: Judge Fitzwater, at your first hearing on November 22, 1985, I asked you to tell the committee your role in the posting of election material at various polling places in the Dallas, Texas, area. The signs posted informed voters of the consequences of voter fraud. For the record, will you again tell the committee your involvement in that incident?

Judge Fitzwater responded:

"At the November 2, 1982, general election in Dallas County, I was a candidate for election to the 298th district court, having been appointed to that position earlier in the year.

"Two days prior to the election on Sunday, October 31, 1982, I received a telephone call from Justice Pat Guillot, a judge on the Dallas Court of appeals. I was not home at the time, but when I returned home I returned his telephone call.

"At that time, Justice Guillot asked me to participate in an effort to help reduce voter fraud. He told me that the effort would consist of the posting of signs in polling places warning the consequences of voter fraud.

"He represented to me that the effort would take place throughout Dallas County in its entirety; that the effort had been approved by the Texas secretary of state; that it had been approved by the Dallas County sheriff; and that there was a need for judicial candidates to participate because there were not enough volunteers to cover every precinct.

"He indicated to me that for those precincts for which they could not get volunteers, the sheriff of Dallas County would utilize his deputies and that there were not enough deputies to cover all of the precincts, so that judicial candidates were being asked to help out with the rest.

"Based on those representations, I agreed to participate. The next day, November 1, 1982, after completing a day of jury trial that was in its second week—at the conclusion of that day, delivered to my chambers were nine signs; a list of precincts, with three precincts designated; and a cover letter from Justice Guillot.

"The cover letter confirmed again that he had received the approval of the secretary of state and the Dallas County sheriff for this effort. The signs were to be posted, three at each precinct, and I was, as I said, given a list of the precincts.

"I had earlier in the day asked Judge Craig Enoch, a fellow state district judge, whether he had been asked to participate. Judge Enoch's name was mentioned to me in Justice Guillot's telephone call.

"The first time in the day, Judge Enoch indicated he had not been contacted, but at the end of the day he indicated he had been. He had made other arrangements to post his signs that he had been given, so he agreed to accompany me in the posting of my signs.

"The first polling place on my list was South Oak Cliff High School, which is located in south Dallas County. Judge Enoch accompanied me to that polling place that evening somewhere between the hours of 8:30 and 9:30 p.m. I posted three of the signs there at what I believed to be the main entrance to the high school.

I then drove to the other two polling places, but found that signs had already been posted there. I do not know by whom, and to this day do not know. Therefore, I did not post signs there.

"I then proceeded to the next location and found that signs had already been posted there, so I did not post additional signs. I dropped Judge Enoch off at his house and I returned to my house with six extra signs."

2. Question: Judge Fitzwater, as far as you were aware, the posting of these signs had been cleared by the Texas secretary of state and by the Dallas County sheriff. Now, was there any reason for you to believe otherwise, and if so, please explain?

Judge Fitzwater responded:

"No, Mr. Chairman, these was no reason for me to believe otherwise. As I previously testified, Justice Guillot represented to be orally that the effort was approved and, in addition, he set forth those representations in a letter that I mentioned that accompanied the signs and the precinct list. If I may, Mr. Chairman, I brought the letter with me. I would like to read that, if I may, at this time. It is not the letterhead of Pat Guillot.

"The letter reads as follows: 'Governor Clements' Ballot security chairman requested that all of his judicial appointments help out in the effort to keep voting fraud to a minimum. You are requested to post these posters in the polling places early tomorrow. Your precincts have been circled. 'I talked with David Dean and Sheriff Byrd Friday and cleared this with them. Remember, when you discourage voting fraud, you gain votes, too.' "And it is signed Pat Guillot."

3. Question: Judge Fitzwater, were you aware of any statutes or election codes that were violated by the posting of these signs?

Judge Fitzwater responded:

"None that I know of."

It should be noted that the judiciary committee confirmed this in a letter received from Theodore P. Steinke, assistant district attorney, chief, public integrity section, specialized crime division, Dallas County. Mr. Steinke's letter states in part:

"This office concluded there was no violation of the Texas penal code or the Texas election code which, in fact, neither permits nor prohibits such signs."

4. Question: Judge Fitzwater, there has also been an allegation that the placing of these signs was an attempt to intimidate minority voters at the polling place.

How do you respond to that allegation?

Judge Fitzwater's response was as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, I can state unequivocally that I had no personal intent nor was I attempting to intimidate minority voters."

5. Question: Judge Fitzwater, there has been an allegation that these signs incorrectly stated the law regarding voter fraud. Would you tell the committee what the signs states, and were they, in fact, derived from Texas law?

Judge Fitzwater responded:

"The sign started out as follows, in smaller black type: 'Do Not Remove This Sign by Order of the Sheriff of Dallas County.' Then in large, red type it said, 'You Can Be Imprisoned' and then under that in black type, in smaller type, 'Number one if you offer, accept or agree to offer or accept money or anything else of value to vote or not vote; two, if you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote; three, if you vote without being registered; four, if you let a person vote more than once; five, if you vote with someone else's registration; six, violate Texas Election Code or Texas Penal Code'."

"Then underneath that in larger, red type it again said, 'Don't Risk It, Obey the Law'."

"As to whether or not the particular items in the sign were derived from Texas law, in my research of the matter, which took place after the incident in question, I found the following.

"With respect to item number one, 'if you offer, accept or agree to offer or accept money or anything else of value to vote or not vote,' in November of 1982 section 3602(a)(1) of the Texas Penal Code, entitled 'bribery,' provided in pertinent part, 'a person commits an offense if he intentionally or knowingly offers, confers or agrees to confer on another or solicits, accepts or agrees to accept from another any pecuniary benefit as consideration for the recipient's decision, opinion, recommendation, vote, or other excercise of discretion as a public servant, party official or voter.' The offense of bribery was a second-degree felony punishable by imprisonment for a term of 2 to 20 years.

"The second item, 'if you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote'—I might make an observation with respect to this item and item number four. In my review of the sign, I believe that these particular items were directed to election officers as opposed to voters.

"I think that is true because of the way the sign reads, and also because of where the signs were to be placed.

"In November of 1982, article 15.24 of the Texas Election Code, entitled 'influencing voter,' provided, 'any judge, clerk, or other person who may be in the room where an election, either primary, special, or general, is being held who there indicates by word or sign how he desires a citizen to vote or not to vote shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $500 and be confined in jail not less than 10 nor more than 30 days.' The period of imprisonment for that offense, as set forth in the statute, is 10 to 30 days.

"Number three, 'if you vote without being registered,' in November 1982, article 15.41 of the Texas Election Code, entitled 'illegal voting,' provided, 'if any person knowing himself not to be a qualified voter shall at any election vote for or against any officer to be then chosen or for or against any proposition to be determined by said election, he shall be guilty of a third-degree felony.'

"Pursuant to article 5.02(a) of the election code, a qualified voter was a person who, among other things, has complied with the registration requirements of this code. In November 1982, a third-degree felony was punishable by imprisonment for a term of two to ten years.

"Item number four, 'if you let a person vote more than once'—as I indicated previously, Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that this item, like item four, is directed to election officers.

"In November 1982, article 15.42 of the Texas Election Code, entitled 'instigating illegal voting,' provided, 'whoever shall procure, aid or advise another to give his vote at any election, knowing that the person is not qualified to vote, or shall procure, aid or advise another to give his vote more than once in such election shall be guilty of a felony of the third degree.'

"In November 1982, a third-degree felony was punishable by imprisonment for a term of two to ten years.

"Item number five, 'if you vote with someone else's registration,' in November 1982, article 15.48 of the Texas Election Code, entitled 'falsely personating another,' provided, 'whoever attempts to falsely personate in an election another person and vote or attempt to vote on the authority of a voter registration certificate not issued to him by the county's registrar of voters shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than five years.' So the period of imprisonment, three to five years, is set forth in the statute.

"Finally, item number six, 'violate Texas Election Code or Texas Penal Code,' in November 1982, there were various provisions of the Texas Election Code and election-related provisions of the Texas Penal Code for which one who violated the codes could be punished by imprisonment."

Mr. President, I believe Judge Fitzwater answered questions propounded to him by the judiciary committee in an honest and forthright manner. He is a man of integrity, ability, and courage. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of Judge Fitzwater's nomination for the position of Federal district court judge.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

CLOTURE MOTION

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the question of advising and consenting to the nomination of Sidney A. Fitzwater, of Texas, to be United States District Judge for the Northern District of Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the quorum call has been waived.

NOT VOTING—3

Bumpers	Inouye	Mathias

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 64, the nays are 33. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn having voted in the affirmative, the motion is agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second for the yeas and nays?

Mr. METZENBAUM. On the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio seeks the yeas and nays on the nomination.

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now, then, the question is on the yeas and nays. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am seeking recognition to speak on the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has been recognized to speak on the nomination, and the Senate will be in order.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, we had a very short debate time on the cloture motion. I would like to take a few minutes to discuss this nomination a little further. First of all, let me say it comes before us——

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may we have order so Senators can hear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Maryland will suspend, the Chair will seek order.

Mr. President, this nomination comes before us, first of all, without a report from the committee and without a printed hearing record. Far be it for me to intrude into the procedures of the Judiciary Committee, but it does seem to me that if we are going to have controversial nominations on the floor of the Senate—and this obviously is such a nomination, with a fairly close cloture vote, and I assume a fairly close vote to come on confirmation—we ought to have a report, or at a minimum that the hearings of the committee should be printed so that the Members of the Senate can have the opportunity to have the printed hearing record before them and be in a position to review it.

Now, as I understand it, a hearing was held on this nominee on November 22, 1985. And then another hearing was held on February 5 of this year. So it was clear after the first hearing, I take it, that it was not a nomination without some questions to it.

Given that this was the case, the Senate should have had the benefit, I would hope, of a report and a dissent but, if not, at least the hearings should have been printed and made available so Members could have had them and had an opportunity to review for ourselves the testimony that Mr. Fitzwater made before the committee, the questions that were put to him, and his responses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regrets to interrupt the Senator from Maryland, but the Senate is not in order. The Chair urgently requests Senators desiring to converse leave the Chamber, retire to the cloakroom so the Senator from Maryland can be heard. The Senator will not proceed until the Senate is in order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. SARBANES. Second, Mr. President, I was really prompted to take this time after the invoking of cloture by some of the comments that were made in the debate leading up to the cloture vote, and particularly by the very elaborate point that was made by the chairman of the committee pointing out that a grand jury had looked into Mr. Fitzwater's activities and had decided that there was not a sufficient basis to indict him criminally.

Well, I am happy to hear that, but it seems to me that if the standard now for being placed on the Federal bench is that you are not criminally indictable, we have reached a pretty low state.

So the second point I want to make, and the one that really moved me to take this time—I had not originally planned to speak again on this nominee because I spoke briefly before the cloture vote—is the standard that at least some in this body are setting for lifetime appointments to the Federal bench. I hope that there is a standard higher than not being criminally indictable. I do not really think it contributes very much to the argument on behalf of the nominee to cite chapter and verse about investigations that were made into his activities which then resulted in no further criminal proceedings.

This is an instance in which the fact that he had engaged in activities which prompted such an investigation should raise questions about his qualifications to go on the Federal bench and to receive the confirmation of the U.S. Senate to a lifetime appointment.

Some, in fact, have raised the question should he be denied a Federal judgeship, as though in some way there is a claim or an entitlement to a Federal judgeship. It seems to me that those assertions need to be addressed and thought about by Members of this body.

It is my own view that once a nomination to the Federal bench is sent to us by the President, the role of the Senate is broader and deeper than it is with executive branch nominations, because we are talking about the third independent branch of the Government, and that the argument that a President uses with respect to the executive branch—namely, that these people are to serve him in the executive branch—is not present when you are considering a judgeship appointment. The nomination by the President represents the President's judgment and is entitled to consideration by the Senate. But the courts are the third independent branch of our Federal Government, and I think it requires the Senate to make a very independent judgment, particularly in light of the fact that once confirmed, these nominees will serve for life.

Mr. President, I discussed in the earlier debate the sign that Mr. Fitzwater was posting in Dallas in the 1982 election. Actually, as I think about it, this issue is one of the best arguments for bringing TV to the Senate. I wish we had television now, so that the people could actually see the sign we are talking about, because proponents of Mr. Fitzwater, in talking about the sign, spent a lot of time talking about the small, black print that cannot be read unless you are very close to the sign. I want to talk about the large, capital, red letters that can be read from anywhere in this Chamber and from its gallery: "You can be imprisoned. Don't risk it. Obey the law."

Well, someone says: "What's wrong with that? You ought to obey the law. Don't risk it. You can be imprisoned if you don't obey it."

Mr. Fitzwater is posting these signs in minority precincts in Dallas. He was a sitting member of the bench at the time, as I understand it, so you have a judge engaged in this kind of activity, running around precincts, posting these election signs. You are also doing it in a part of the country where there has been a past history of intimidation of voters, people fearful of exercising their franchise.

I submit that coming in with a sign, even if it had none of the black print, which you cannot read anyhow—you have to get right up to the sign to read the black print—if you just came in with the red letters, a huge sign, big, red letters, posted them in the precinct, my view of that is that it is a tactic of intimidation.

This was done in the context of such activity taking place in other parts of the country. It is not as though this were an isolated event. Intimidation took place in the 1981 gubernatorial election in New Jersey. That led, in effect, to a consent order being signed by the Republican committee with respect to that activity, which was engaged in the 1981 gubernatorial election. In 1984, in the State of Maryland, in certain precincts, private security guards in uniform came into the precinct, wearing big badges, "ballot security," posted signs. That is a tactic of intimidation.

There is an electoral board in every jurisdiction designed to run honest elections, and they ought to be held to that. I can think of nothing more sacred in our democracy than an honest election and protecting the right of people to vote. It is the fundamental basis upon which our democratic political system rests. It is essential to everything else—essential.

We are told that Mr. Fitzwater is a very bright person. He may in fact be a bright person.

Then a lot of accusations are made—why is everyone interested in this thing? I am frank to tell you that I had not focused on the Fitzwater nomination until I came on the floor and saw this sign and became apprised of the fact that he was involved in this tactic.

Three of his fellow judges on the bench, involved in that election, as I understand it, were asked to post signs and in the end refused to do it because they felt it was improper. They perceived that doing this undercut and undermined the integrity of the political process, and they were not about to lend themselves to it. Mr. Fitzwater went ahead and did it.

They say, "Well, he only did it in one place." He did it. He went back to his own precinct, not in a minority area, where there were no such signs, recognized that there were no such signs, by his own testimony, as I understand it, but did not post any signs there.

I submit that no Member of this body can look at that sign and not appreciate what was at work. You can read those red capital letters clearly from the opposite side of the room. I cannot refer to the gallery, or I would ask the people upstairs whether they can see it. Obviously, they can see it. You cannot see the black letters.

When the proponents of Mr. Fitzwater got up to talk, they spent all their time talking about those supposed statements of Texas law. Well, there has been some debate about whether they accurately state Texas law or do not accurately state Texas law. Someone said, "You can't try to influence the way someone votes." Of course, that is the heart of the democratic process. We are then told that what they meant is that you cannot do it within 50 feet of the polling place. It does not say that.

I do not want to be caught up in arguing about what the Texas law says. I want to talk about what anyone approaching the polling place would have seen, and that is the sign with the huge, red capital letters. Three of Fitzwater's colleagues had the good judgment, the sensitivity, the understanding, to sense, that this was not the right thing to do, and they refused to do it. He went ahead with it.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. The distinguished committee chairman, in his argument for this nomination, made much of the fact that this was just done in one precinct, as if it had been done in 10, 20, 30, or 40 precincts, that might have been enough not to put the nomination forward. Does the Senator from Maryland think there is an argument to be made here that the nominee put the sign up in one precinct only?

Mr. SARBANES. My own view is that the judgment that we are seeking to evaluate was reflected when Mr. Fitzwater went ahead and posted the sign.

Mr. HART. That he just put up one?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes, I do not think you can put these kinds of signs up. We are not only told on the one hand he is a very bright fellow, and I am in no position to argue that—I accept the assertion—we are told he was very bright, was the tops at his law school at Baylor, very smart, and everything. Then, on the other hand, he goes out and posts this sign.

Then we are supposed to say, well, in a sense maybe he did not really realize what he was doing.

When he came before the committee I did read an excerpted version of this, and I have to admit it may not be in full context. As I said earlier we do not have printed hearing records before us. He continued to defend this sign. I guess he thought, "I am now in this position: I either got to defend it and ride it out that way, or admit it was a mistake and then see how people will react to that."

But he reflects no sensitivity to what the impact of the sign is. I invite everyone of my colleagues to take a careful look at that sign and to ask themselves what the impact of that would be on voters going to the polling place, particularly bearing in mind that you are talking about minority voters where there has been a historical problem at least of the right of access to the polling place.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Mr. HART. It was only recently, was it not—one should not probably draw too great a comparison here—that many people in this country celebrated what is now being called a democratic revolution in the Philippines, brought on not by Mr. Marcos' excess in centralizing political power, not just by Mrs. Marcos' excesses in spending Filipino taxpayers' dollars, but because an election was stolen, some extraordinary practices were used to steal an awful lot of votes and tilt the outcome of an election.

Obviously, that is not what is going on here, but it does go to, I think, the very central point, the very accurate remarks the Senator from Maryland made about the extreme importance of integrity in voting and the sanctity of the ballot box and the vote in democracy. Is that not really what the issue is here?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes, and the Senator is absolutely right and I think that is a fundamental issue in our political system.

I am not getting into what Mr. Fitzwater's general ideologies are. I frankly do not know. I think here we have really gone to the very core of the political system.

I have heard the arguments that have been made by the distinguished Senator from Texas who is in effect sponsoring him and he has made some strong arguments as a general proposition.

But is seems to me what is at issue here reaches to the most important element in our democracy. If we do not maintain the integrity of the political process and ensure and enhance people's right to vote, then it will all crumble.

The distinguished Senator from Colorado points out that was the issue in the Philippines. That is why it was so critical.

As I understand it, Mr. Fitzwater, was a sitting judge now and he was personally running around posting signs in these precincts. Now as I am told, he posted it in one precinct of his assigned precincts, and then apparently—and I will be happy to be corrected if this is not correct—drove by two other precincts which had been assigned to him. They had already been posted. So he did not post them there.

The U.S. Department of Justice, just to underscore the seriousness of this, was troubled by this practice and sent a letter to the Dallas County election administrator, stating: the information we have indicates that most of the signs were placed at precincts where black voters were assigned to vote. We are concerned that no nonracial justification has been offered for placing most of the signs at minority precincts." The Justice Department obtained assurances from the Dallas County election administrator that in the future all election judges will be told to post only materials that have been provided by the elections department and approved by the Secretary of State."

It was stated earlier in the debate that subsequent to this election the State of Texas passed a law prohibiting the posting of signs in this manner. So, subsequently the legislature, the officials of the State of Texas, felt that action had to be taken to preclude this from happening again.

I am not arguing this in terms of whether Mr. Fitzwater committed a criminal offense. I do not believe he committed a criminal offense, and that is what these grand jury investigations have concluded. But that does not then cross the threshold of going on the Federal bench.

Of the other judges who were involved, a number of them apparently refused to do it. One said he thought it was in poor taste. Another said he thought it was just a raw campaign effort. And a third apparently felt that it was not something that judges ought to do, it seems to me, a well placed sensitivity on his part.

Now, in the context in which all of this occurred, and I understand at least it is contained in the committee record, the activities the previous year in New Jersey which did in the end lead to a consent order were reported in the Texas press and I assume generally known there to people who were involved in the elections.

We are now shortly, I assume, going to be voting on whether the Senate should confirm Mr. Fitzwater for a lifetime appointment on the Federal bench.

It was asserted earlier by the chairman of the committee that not to do that was somehow unfair to him.

My own reaction to that is that he engaged in an activity which is of sufficient consequence that the Senate ought not to give him approval.

Mr. Fitzwater is young and if, in fact, he is as able and as committed as some have asserted, he will have, I assume, another opportunity at another time. But to send the message that you can go out and engage in this kind of activity as reflected in this sign, in other words, an intimidating approach to voters—as I understand it, 90 percent of the precincts posted with such signs were in the minority areas; at least that is what appears in the record—and then having done that, can still expect to go on the Federal bench for a lifetime appointment, that is not the standard that I think this body should be applying in this instance.

Therefore, I join with those who have been in opposition to this nomination. The ABA committee in reviewing gave him a qualified rating, a majority; a minority thought he was not qualified. And it seems to me that given this activity on his part and given really the lack of a positive record—this is not someone where it is being asserted he has done the following community betterment activities over a number of years.

What is being asserted is he is bright, he received a good rating for his performance on this Dallas bench, which I assume is the lower trial bench of the Texas system, but beyond that no one has asserted a range of civic and community activities on Mr. Fitzwater's behalf that would, in fact, say that this is a person who has been a strong and positive contributor to our community, who really has been concerned about a lot of issues, equal protection under the laws, access to legal services, a whole range of community betterment activities.

Given that it seems to me, Mr. President, the Senate should not give its confirmation to place this person on the Federal bench for life.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I was standing here by the distinguished Senator from Maryland because I wanted to ask if he would accommodate me for a moment and let me ask if Senators on the floor would agree. The majority and minority leaders have agreed to this.

Steve Bell, as Senator BIDEN, the Senator from Delaware, knows, served very well on the Budget Committee for several years and will shortly be leaving the Senate and is having an event today. I was hopeful that a resolution commending him, signed by all members, Democratic and Republican, of the Budget Committee, and the majority leaders could be adopted this afternoon. Because of that, I am going to ask unanimous consent that we leave the executive calendar and return to legislative business for the sole purpose of the Senator from New Mexico introducing a resolution commending Steve Bell and the adoption of the resolution by the Senate, after which time we will return to executive session. I so request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? Hearing none, the Senate returns to legislative session.

COMMENDING STEPHEN E. BELL FOR HIS SERVICE TO THE COUNTRY AND THE SENATE

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will shortly send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. It is very brief.

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has ably and faithfully served the United States Senate since 1974;

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has executed his duties as the Staff Director of the Senate Budget Committee with the utmost in perseverance and personal dedication; and

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has earned the respect of his colleagues and this institution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Stephen E. Bell is hereby commended for his tireless and exemplary service to his country and to the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I wonder if I might be made a cosponsor of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Florida will be added as a cosponsor. Without objection, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] will be added as a cosponsor.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I inform the Senate that all members of the Budget Committee, from the majority and minority sides, are original cosponsors, and the distinguished majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 367) commending Stephen E. Bell for his service to the country and the Senate.

The resolution was introduced by Mr. DOMENICI (for himself), Mr. DOLE, Mr. CHILES, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. EXON, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HART, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SASSER, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. SYMMS.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I present a resolution commending the service of Stephen E. Bell as staff director of the Senate Budget Committee. Steve is well known to the Senate as one of its most able and most dedicated professionals. I am certain that my colleagues and the Senate as a whole know that when I speak of Steve's contribution to the Budget Committee, to the legislative process, and to me personally, that I speak with great personal affection. Steve Bell joined my staff when I was a freshman Senator, became my closest personal adviser, and shared with me 13 eventful, chaotic, and successful years here in Washington.

Steve moves on to a different career and a different set of challenges as vice president at Salomon Bros. His talents, his vigor, and his wisdom will be sorely missed, both professionally and personally, by this Senator, the Budget Committee staff, his friends and colleagues on both the House and Senate staffs, and by the many Members of Congress who have worked with him.

Over the years, Steve has come to be identified with knowledge of the programs, politics, and mechanisms that make up the budget process. Whether a Budget Committee Senator, a reporter dedicated to the budget, an official in the executive branch, or a fellow staffer—all have come to Steve at one time or another to seek his opinion and advice.

This unswerving focus on preserving and developing the budget process for the United States has had a substantial impact on the Senate and the Nation. His 13 years of service have been marked by numerous achievements. He has directed the Budget Committee staff through six budget resolutions and three reconciliation bills. He provided much of the technical support for the major modifications made to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill. And he leaves us this year very close to a resolution on the fiscal year 1987 budget, one which attracts bipartisan support and meets the targets set out in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Steve's record with the Senate is one of which he can be proud. And, likewise, he is a man in whom I and many of my colleagues have taken pride. It will take both time and changes for his personality and intellect to be replaced on my staff and in the Senate, but this job will be made easier by one of Steve's many talents—the talent to attract and retain qualified, industrious, and creative staff. While I will miss Steve's energy and experience, I am confident that they will serve him well in his new endeavors and that new strengths will emerge in his former staff to fill the hole that he will leave.

The resolution that I am introducing commends Steve for some of the professional talents on which we have come to rely—diligence, perseverance, integrity, and loyalty to the Senate and the budget process.

But, I will most remember Steve's time here for his friendship and creativity, and for the enjoyment many of us took in working with him.

I am sure that Steve will excel in his new career at Salomon Bros., just as he excelled here. We will miss him, but we join in wishing him the luck and success that his service here deserve.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I just want to join with my distinguished chairman and say that I have enjoyed very much the pleasure of working with Steve Bell for over 10 years now. I think he has been a great asset to the whole budget process. He certainly has been a diligent worker for the Congress and for the efforts that we made in this regard. I certainly wish him well.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, those of us who have worked closely with the Senate Budget Committee know what an enormous contribution and commitment Steve Bell has made to the congressional budget process.

Steve's dedication and hard work have been a key ingredient in the success of every major budget victory since 1981, when Republicans took control of the Senate. During last year's long and difficult negotiations to produce a budget resolution, we repeatedly relied on Steve's detailed knowledge of the budget.

And from what I understand, the same was true during the conference on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. Someone, I think, suggested that the only way everyone could understand what was in the bill was to staple Steve to the conference report.

Steve did not have to undergo that torture, but he has had to put up with a lot. And I personally want to thank him for all the help he has provided over the years, and wish him well as he goes off to join Salomon Bros. and another budget wizard, David Stockman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). Is there further debate?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, here in the Senate we are privileged to be served by people of immense talent and ability who come from all over the country because they care about the issues facing our country and they feel by serving on the staff of the U.S. Senate they can really make a contribution to making this country and world a better place.

But the cream of the crop, in my opinion, is Steve Bell. I have had the opportunity to work very closely with him in the last several years. I just want to join with what the Senator from New Mexico has said, not only in wishing him well but in complimenting him. The intellectual ability, the integrity with which he has served the Budget Committee in the Senate, the effectiveness he has had and the endless hours he has put in, honestly, Mr. President, are an inspiration to me and to a lot of other people who are Senators and staffers who have seen him in action.

So, Mr. President, I just want to join my friend from New Mexico in wishing him all success and thanking him for his devoted and effective efforts on our behalf.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, as I indicated, I really do not want to take the time of the Senate at this point. I have stated my thoughts.

I will, when we have a more leisurely opportunity, perhaps in morning business, express some very detailed remarks and observations and my personal feelings with reference to Mr. Bell. He will be with us for a few more days until we complete the budget resolution, hopefully, in the committee and on the floor.

But since there is a rather significant event in his behalf, I was hopeful we could have passed the resolution this afternoon, and it seems like we will.

I thank Senators for their comments. If there is no further comments, I ask that the Senate adopt the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ARMSTRONG). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 367) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 367), with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 367

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has ably and faithfully served the United States Senate since 1974;

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has executed his duties as the Staff Director of the Senate Budget Committee with the utmost in perseverance and personal dedication; and

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has earned the respect of his colleagues and this institution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Stephen E. Bell is hereby commended for his tireless and exemplary service to his country and to the United States Senate.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

THE JUDICIARY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume executive business.

The Senate resumed consideration of the nomination of Sidney A. Fitzwater, of Texas, to be U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, for some reason we have decided to continue this debate. I thought it was our initial understanding that once we had the cloture vote that we would proceed to a vote. But since we are dragging this dead cat across the table again, I rise to make a few remarks because it seems to me the decision has been made to delay perhaps some other bill coming up this afternoon.

I want to review the basic fact again. In the last 2 weeks a great case has been made, based on very little evidence and very little fact. I want to refer to two people who I think are closer to this whole debate about this sign than anybody else: The Democratic county chairman, who was chairman when the sign was posted and when a lawsuit was filed, and the Democatic district attorney that conducted an investigation.

But before I do that, I just cannot fail to rise to debate in talking about the Philippines and this sign. I am afraid, Mr. President, that the problem in the Philippines wasn't that they were telling people to obey the law and vote. The problem was those who were counting were not obeying the law. It seems to me there is a lot of self-righteousness about putting up a sign saying, "Don't violate the law; don't participate in vote fraud."

But let me remind my colleagues that in the previous election in Dallas County, there had been rampant vote fraud. In fact, 11 indictments came down and six people were found guilty. In fact, two workers for the same individual who has written a pious letter to this body about this sign and about this debate, two of his workers were, in fact, convicted of vote fraud in an election that produced the concern about ballot security.

I am concerned about ballot security. I was elected to the Congress initially by less than 200 votes, so every vote counted in my election.

We had people plead guilty to voter fraud in Dallas County. And all of these so-called facts are cited, but I want to go back to two facts, and then I am through dragging this dead cat around.

No. 1, the district attorney of Dallas County is a Democrat. He responded to complaints that were filed about the sign. In a letter to the committee, summing up the investigation done by the Democratic district attorney in Dallas, he said:

I can tell you that the signs appeared not only in some South Dallas precincts, but also in some North Dallas ones; and that there was no evidence that the signs were placed in the polling places specifically to intimidate or disenfranchise voters. This office concluded that there was no violation of the Texas penal code or the Texas election code.

This is a Democratic officeholder, a district attorney who on the heels of the allegations undertook an investigation with a grand jury, and found that no law had been violated. The Democratic county chairman filed a lawsuit naming nine people in the posting of this sign. Fitzwater was named, but his name was dropped before it ever got to court. And then the whole case was thrown out of Federal court.

When a hearing was held on Sid Fitzwater, Robert M. Greenburg, who was Dallas County Democratic chairman when this whole controversy occurred, came to Washington at his own expense, and testified in favor of Sid Fitzwater. In fact, prior to that time he had written a letter, and the letter says, "I believe I can speak to both"—that is, the sign and to Sid Fitzwater—"because in 1982 I was chairman of the Democratic Party of Dallas County. And since Judge Fitzwater's appointment and selection to the State district court, I have practiced in his court and tried lawsuits before him. While I in no way agree with the tactics of the Republicans during the 1982 election, in my opinion Judge Fitzwater's connection with it was so infinitesimal that it certainly has no bearing and no relationship to his competence and his ability to be a Federal judge."

I might also say that it is my understanding that when Bob Greenburg appeared before the committee, he made it very clear that he was no supporter of mine, no supporter of the President, and supported virtually nothing that I had done or the President had done except appointing Sid Fitzwater. What is the relevant point here?

The relevant point here is this: There was a ballot security program in Dallas County following a period where there was rampant vote fraud and people were convicted of vote fraud. They put up some signs that says "You can be imprisoned. Don't disobey the law" or—and I know my colleague from Maryland said everybody can read it from across the Chamber but I guess my old eyes are wearing out—"Don't risk it, obey the law."

I am not here to vote whether Sid Fitzwater as a newly appointed judge, as a person who was running for election for the first time in his life, should have decided it was a good idea or a bad idea not to post the sign. It in fact is true that when Sid Fitzwater was asked before the committee if he had any second thoughts given all the points that were being raised, he said that he did in fact. So I am not debating the sign.

But the point I want to make is the district attorney of Dallas County who is a Democrat found nothing wrong with the sign or the posting of it, and the Dallas County Democratic chairman who abhorred the sign and filed a lawsuit supports Sid Fitzwater's nomination. Why is that? Why despite all the effort to make this a partisan debate is it really not a partisan debate? It is really not a partisan debate because we are talking about an extraordinary young man with extraordinary ability. And the whole reason this has been controversial is not because of the sign, but I submit, Mr. President, because the candidate is so well qualified and because of his age.

He has been editorially endorsed by both major newspapers in Dallas County. He is strongly supported on a bipartisan basis back home and numerous people, from the deans of law schools to politicians who consider him a potential Supreme Court nominee some day.

That is what activated all these groups from the Americans for Democratic Action on down. They were activated because Sid is no dullard. This is a 32-year-old brilliant jurist who is going to be on the bench a long time, and who, I submit, someday we are going to be back here talking about moving him to the fifth circuit, and maybe someday beyond.

The debate here, and the concern here is about ability—about the ability to move up in the judicial system, and to represent a philosophy. It is a philosophy as old as the Nation. It is a philosophy of strict construction of the Constitution. It is a philosophy that believes the courts ought to interpret the law, and not make the law. It is a philosophy that believes that for too long we have been too concerned about criminals rights and not enough concerned about victim's rights.

I believe the case is so overwhelming for Sid Fitzwater that I am convinced that if each Member of this body went back and read the testimony, looked at his qualifications, and looked at his record—a record of excellence in everything he has done in his life—there would be no doubt whatsoever about this nomination.

It only saddens me that all of these changes, that all of the outside special interest groups have come out against this fine young man without really knowing him, without looking at his record, and without trying to measure the content of his character all in an effort to keep a 32-year-old brilliant jurist from going to the bench.

Was posting the sign right or wrong? As MITCH MCCONNELL from Kentucky said, if you are a Republican in the South, and you look at the potential for vote fraud in every election, when you have people as happened in Dallas County recently with an investigation that led to the dismissal of election judges, when you have people that have been dead for months who send in four absentee ballots, and when you have people vote from a vacant lot, then this does not seem like voter intimidation to you. It seems like trying to protect the sanctity of the ballot.

The point I want to end on is that this sign is not in isolation. I do not know what happened in New Jersey. I do not suppose Sid Fitzwater knows what happened in New Jersey. We try to tend to our business in Texas and leave New Jersey alone. They do not always reciprocate. But this sign was posted in the wake of rampant voter fraud in Dallas County where 11 indictments had come down and six people had been sentenced, including two workers in a campaign of a Member of the U.S. Congress. This is serious business.

So the idea that people might have been concerned about ballot security is easy to understand. In my perspective, it made sense. In fact, it had everything to do with trying to prevent what happened in the Philippines. The ballot is sacred. If somebody cheats and votes twice or votes under somebody else's name or people vote as living on a vacant lot, that lowers the value of everybody else's vote.

I guess the truth is that the truth is somewhere between the position of the Senator from Maryland and my position. but the point is this: Whether it was a mistake or not a mistake, you are looking at the posting of one sign in one precinct by an individual who has an outstanding record of achievement in everything he has done in his life. I am not going to read the statements made by judges on the current fifth circuit all the way down to deans of law schools. But I could not let this debate go on without coming back one more time and pointing out what a strong candidate this is.

Senator MCCONNELL from Kentucky, who has no relationship to Texas, and who had never met Sid Fitzwater until he came before the committee made an extraordinary statement. He said, "I have been on the committee for 15 months," and we have considered many jurists, many of them very senior people, but in his opinion as a lawyer and a former judge he said Sid Fitzwater was the strongest nominee to come before the committee in the 15 months that he has been here. That is a very strong recommendation.

It fits exactly with the ballot poll in Texas finding him the most highly rated judge, not just in the aggregate, but in each of the four areas of hardworking, impartial, correctly applying the law, and demonstrating proper judicial temperament and demeanor.

On each of those items to the best of my knowledge he was rated higher than any other State, Federal, or local judge in Texas.

That is not the end-all, but I am simply asking my colleagues to look at the big picture. Do not be stampeded by people who do not even know the judicial candidate, who have not looked at his extraordinary record, but who, because some judicial activist group called on them to, sent a letter on their letterhead and said they oppose Sid Fitzwater. I hope my colleagues will look deeper than that. I am sorry to prolong the debate. I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EAST). The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think it is very important for this record to be as complete as possible.

First of all, I want to say to my distinguished colleague from Texas he can try to read into the opposition to this nomination anything he wants, but so far as this Senator is concerned, his interest in the confirmation of this nomination was really started from seeing the signs and then referring from that back to what occurred in his own State with respect to intimidation of voters, and what I knew had taken place in other States.

It is a shame in a way that this has happened. Why are we getting nominees with this kind of thing in their record, where you are then expected to overlook it or sanction it? Why can we not get nominees who do not have these kinds of problems, who can be bright and have the kind of policy views that the Senator referred to being nominated and not be in the position of, in effect, sanctioning this kind of activity?

Concerning the Democratic Party chairman to whom the Senator referred—and I am frank to tell you I do not think the issue is Democratic or Republican; I think the issue of conducting an honest election and protecting people's right to vote transcends the parties—the Senator quoted him before the committee. I am not privy to what may have brought this testimony on, but at the time when this happened the party chairman, Mr. Greenberg, to whom the Senator referred, said the signs were aimed at intimidating minority voters. This is in the Dallas paper of November 12, 1982.

Greenberg said, "The judges who posted the signs were bigots. To me, it is the worst scandal we have ever had in the courthouse."

In a sense, I think in some ways it is irrelevant, what the Democratic Party chairman said. I do not think it matters what the Democratic Party chairman said or what the Republican chairman said. We have to make a judgment on the use of this sign and whether it carried with it the prospect of intimidation and whether someone who engaged in that ought to go on to the Federal bench. I think that is the issue. I do not think people around the country ought to say to themselves, "Well, we can play these kinds of games and it really will not matter."

I have a very strong concern about the integrity of the ballot, but the way to safeguard the integrity of the ballot is to make sure you have an election system that guarantees it, not to have the respective candidates running around posting these signs in these huge capital red letters which anyone looking at it perceives to be an intimidation of the voters. This sign posting is not the way to address the sanctity of the ballot.

Fitzwater engaged in this and was not found criminally liable. I concede that. I think the standard for going on the Federal bench is higher than that. It seems to me that what is reflected here is a fundamental lack of good judgment. For that reason, I very strongly oppose this nomination.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to prolong this process. I have no intention of doing that. The only reason I am speaking now is that I was conducting a hearing on white collar crime at the time the debate took place earlier, and, through my own scheduling problems, I only had 58 seconds to state my case. I am going to take about 5 minutes now, if I may, to try to explain as simply and succinctly as I can why I think Mr. Fitzwater should not be made a Federal judge.

I attended the entire hearing on Mr. Fitzwater and I had an opportunity to question him at length. Although it sometimes appears very presumptuous that we Senators sit here and pass judgment on individuals and their motivation, unfortunately it is our constitutional responsibility. I do not feel real good about it, but nonetheless it is our responsibility.

Let me tell you what my impression of Mr. Fitzwater is and why I am going to vote against him.

I have not had the opportunity to hear my colleague from Maryland nor my colleague from Massachusetts, nor my colleague from Ohio, who have spoken against Mr. Fitzwater, so I will not characterize what their views are. It is my general impression that they have a little bit stronger feeling about Mr. Fitzwater's motivations and sensitivity, or lack thereof, than I do.

Nonetheless, I come down on the side of being against Mr. Fitzwater for the following reasons:

He is a very bright, articulate young man. Far be it from me, having arrived in the Senate at the age of 29, to be critical of anyone holding high public office because they are too young. In the appearance of Mr. Fitzwater, part of the reason why he was declared by a minority view as not qualified related to his age.

It did not relate to anything he had done. It did not relate to the fact that he lacked academic credentials. Simply stated, the ABA is not, in my view, on occasion, one of the most enlightened organizations, and anyone who is 30 or 31 years old is generally viewed by a portion of the ABA as not being qualified to do anything. It is a notion which, as I said, out of necessity I reject.

Having said that, there are reasons why Mr. Fitzwater should not sit on the bench, in my view.

The background here is not merely this sign, which I believe Mr. Fitzwater believed was not a proper thing to do. I believe Mr. Fitzwater thought that although this may technically be legal, that it was not such a hot idea. Mr. Fitzwater in his testimony said when he was asked whether or not he posted this sign, said he was given the assignment to post it in two specific places. He arrived at the first place. I believe I am quoting him but for absolute accuracy I will say paraphrasing him. He said he was relieved to find that there was already a sign posted there, thereby relieving him of the requirement to post the sign.

He went to the second polling place. There was no such sign and he posted the sign.

In the dialog I had with Mr. Fitzwater under oath, Mr. Fitzwater was asked by me whether or not he saw anything in this sign that would make him feel uneasy. He said, "Well, no," he did not really look at it very closely. We questioned him on technical points earlier about whether or not you can be imprisoned if you influence or try to influence a voter how to vote.

Obviously, depending on how one views that, that is either accurate or inaccurate. If you try to influence a person to vote on the way to the polling place or 50 feet from the polling place, that is not illegal. That is perfectly legal. As a matter of fact, in my State, candidates stand out on the curb and say, "I hope you will vote for me. It is the last clear shot."

My sister, Valerie, stands there with a sign that says "Biden" at every polling place she can get to and says "Don't forget my brother on election day. Don't forget that is today."

Well, that is not illegal. But Mr. Fitzwater, when we questioned him on that particular sentence, said he did not read the sign very clearly. He did not pay much attention to it. All he really paid attention to was he got a call from a senior judge in a partisan election saying, "By the way, it is important for you to get out there and post these signs." And I asked him how comfortable he felt about that. He said he was not very comfortable with it but he checked his mail and the Dallas County Sheriff and the secretary of state said, "It is an all right thing to do; there is nothing wrong with it." And then what he did, when asked, he checked with some of his colleagues on the bench and some of his colleagues said, "No, I am not going to go do that." There were several of his colleagues who were asked to do the same thing and they said, "No." They just did not think it was proper.

Well, you have to put this in context, in my view. Here you have a very bright, very articulate and understandably—I do not say this critically—a very ambitious young man. This fellow has enough intellectual capability that some day we could be standing on the floor of the Senate deciding whether or not he is a circuit court judge or Supreme Court Justice. I believe, looking at him and having been a young man once and having had some ambition, I can sense it like most of you can, this is a fellow who saw his career in front of him and here a senior Republican judge, who also is a political force in the county, says, "Fitzie, baby, go post these signs."

Now, he does not want to know much more than that. He went out in my view and found his rationale. He had two letters that he kept referring to constantly, two letters, one from the secretary of State, one from the county sheriff, the sheriff's department, saying it was all right to do that. I think what he engaged in is what we all do on occasion, a little bit of setting up the position of plausible deniability. He found his rationale. He knew that politically he should post the signs, but I believe, as one of our most famous colleagues in this body said, in his heart he knew he should not post that sign.

Now, why do I say that? I went through his testimony. He was a very good witness. I asked him some of the following questions. And do not forget, this is one of the brightest young, or brightest old for that matter, nominees this administration or any has sent up. And I mean this sincerely, an incredibly bright guy. I asked him, I said, "Let me ask you about the history of Texas. It is little bit like my State of Delaware, a past that we are not particularly proud of whereby it used to be very difficult for black folks, minorities, to vote." We were segregated by law in my State, in our constitution. And I said, "Are you aware of the long history of intimidation of voters?" Just trying to get a sense of what he was like, what he thought about these kinds of things, the degree of sensitivity he had about minority points of view. And he said no, he really had not paid much attention to that.

And I said, "Well, are you not aware that it was not too many decades ago you could not walk up to a polling place, a black man, and be able to vote?" And he said, well, yes, he was aware of that, but he had not paid a lot of attention to that.

I said, "Well, look, were you aware of the controversy, the nationwide controversy going on relating to a ballot security program, where up in New Jersey, a Northern State, a State never segregated by law, you had folks with black armbands standing in the polling places with intimidating signs and physical appearance that was intimidating?"

He said, no, he had not heard any of that. He was not aware of any of that.

I thought, well, that is kind of funny. And, again, I believed him, I believed him that he was not aware of it, but I began to try to figure out, what is making this guy tick? As smart as he is, how can you look at that sign and not have a problem? And I asked him, I said, "Look, why do you think we are doing this? Why do you think I am asking you these questions?"

He looked me straight in the eye and he said, "Politics." Just simple politics.

I said, "Can't you at least try to reach out a little bit, try to understand how this might be, might be, viewed as intimidating by some people in our society?" And that is the first little bit of give I got the whole time. He said, "Well, I can kind of see that now, but I didn't think of it at the time."

I said, "OK, so far, so good," Now, quite frankly, I say to my friend from Maryland, at that point he had me. At that point I was going to come down on the side of a man who I have great respect for, Senator SIMON, clearly a man who has unquestionable credentials in the area of civil rights, a man who has been both judicious and thorough in the way he has looked at nominees and a man who has concluded to vote for Fitzwater. To be fair to Fitzwater, I was there figuring well, this guy just slipped. And then I asked him the following question. I said, "Mr. Fitzwater, when you found this out, that in fact it wasn't sanctioned by the county sheriff and it wasn't sanctioned by the secretary of State, and when you stopped and reflected that you probably wouldn't be in any trouble at all were it not for the fact the senior judge lied to you, what did you do?" He said, "What do you mean, Senator?" I said, "Well, what did you do? Did you pick up the phone and call that senior judge and say something like, 'Your Honor, if you were 20 years younger, I would take you down to the gym and pound the living something out of you,' or, 'Your Honor, I think it was unfortunate what you did to me,' 'Why did you lie to me?' or, 'I am angry,' or, 'I am upset'."

I can tell my colleagues now if one of you ever lied to me and got me in a spot like that, I would hope to see you in the gymnasium, and in fact if you were a more capable man than I physically, I would at least let you know what I thought of you.

Now, it seems to me a natural human emotion. Here a guy's whole career is about to go down the drain potentially because somebody lied to him. If he in fact truly believed there was no problem and the only reason he posted the sign was no the strength of the two letters—because, by the way, I asked him, I said, "Was there voter fraud down there?" He said, "No, I wasn't aware of it." I said, "Were you worried about it?" He said, "No." Brad Reynolds, one of the people who most of us would—well, I will not characterize Brad Reynolds, but he is not a man who marched a lot in Selma. Now, Brad Reynolds says, when we asked him, he saw no problem down there. Brad Reynolds did not have any reason to believe there was going to be fraud in that area, according to what he told us. This fellow did not either. So, Mr. President, I began to wonder about the sincerity of this young man.

And what I really, quite frankly, am most worried about is that if he were—and I am going to be completely blunt about it—if he were a man whose talents did not lend themselves to the prospect of moving even further on the Federal bench, then I would be less worried about him, quite frankly, and let me tell my friend from Maryland why. Because I think he traded in what he knew was right to do because of his ambition. Now, my worry, very bluntly, is what is he going to do on the court? What is he going to do on the court faced with some extremely difficult political decisions that may or may not relate to where he sits and how long he sits? He wants to be a Federal judge. He is there. But what court he sits on?

I believe this fellow has incredible talent. And I, quite frankly, do not believe that he did not at least have a queasy feeling in his stomach when asked to set up the signs. And let me be honest with you. I do not know what I would have done. I have been involved in the civil rights movement. I have been one of those guys who sat in and marched. I got my start as a lawyer in that field. And I want to tell you something. If when I was 29 years old the county chairman called me, the guy who determined, I say to my friend from Mississippi, whether or not I might be the nominee for the U.S. Senate and he told me to do something that I was a little uneasy about, I am not sure I would not go out and try to find justification for doing what was politically beneficial for me to do. I hope I would not but I think we have a lot of self-righteousness on this floor and I, for one, made a bunch of mistakes.

I do not know whether I would have the political courage to do what I am asking, prospectively, this nominee to have done, and that is to say no, it is wrong to put the sign up.

Strange as it sounds, I say to my colleagues that I think that the Federal bench is an even more sacred place than the U.S. Senate.

Either Mr. Fitzwater knew that he should not have done this and went ahead and did it because of his ambition, in which case I believe he should not be barred forever from being on the bench, but he should not be on the bench until he has matured a good deal more than he had at that point, or Mr. Fitzwater in fact truly does not understand why that would be offensive.

If Mr. Fitzwater looks at that sign and truly does not understand why that might worry some people, why that could not be read by reasonable, decent men and women as a veiled threat to their right to legally participate—if he does not understand that, I ask myself, how will he understand, as a Federal judge, when minorities are before him—whether they be Hispanic or black or any other minority—how will he understand the depths of their dilemma?

How will he understand the nuances of the civil rights laws that are designed to deal with the very imaginative inroads that my State and other States have made to provide the right of all America to participate in what is the most sacred responsibility and honor—to vote?

I say that this fellow is not a bad man. I say he is not a racist. I say he is an ambitious young man who is either too sensitive to the concerns and worries and the history and the background that underlie the fight for the right to vote in this country or a young man who concluded that it does not matter.

As I said at the outset, I do not like being a judge of another man's character, because I wonder how I would fare. I hope I would fare well, but I do not know how I would fare if I were a nominee for the Federal bench. It is my responsibility, as it is that of the rest of my colleagues, ultimately to make a judgment. My judgment is that the perception of minorities in his community is such that I doubt whether they will believe they will get a fair shake in a court that has Judge Fitzwater as the sitting judge.

I think that is a little unfair to Mr. Fitzwater. I think a little like the Democratic chairman who testified before our committee, the same man who said this is a most outrageous violation of the law, and so forth, and later came up and testified in behalf of Mr. Fitzwater. Basically, what he was saying to us was that this was outrageous, but he believed Mr. Fitzwater did not mean anything by it.

The county chairman that my friend from Texas refers to—accurately refers to—did in fact say that Fitzwater is an eminently fair and reasonable man. But he never once said that this was not outrageous. He said at election time it was outrageous. He said when the election was over it was outrageous. He said when Mr. Fitzwater was before us that this was outrageous.

What he said was that Mr. Fitzwater is not a bad guy; he is an honorable man. Let us assume that he is, and I am prepared to assume that, for the sake of the debate. The fact that he does not recognize that that is outrageous does not make him a racist, does not make him a bad man, but means to this Senator that he is not sensitive enough to understand what is at stake, to be put on the Federal bench for life, "till do he part," by my vote.

So, although I acknowledge that it is a close call, were I in the position to do anything about it, I would say: "Mr Fitzwater, come back in 5 years. Show me that you understand. Demonstrate to me that you have some sense of indignation about what you were put through by those who told you it was legitimate to do what you did. Demonstrate that you have a deeper understanding of why minorities are concerned about that kind of sign."

Not just because they are Democrats. Not just because they want to take on President Reagan. But because there is a real, live, gut feeling: Fifty years or more of pain to get a chance to vote. Women and men, black and white, who can barely read, see this sign.

I think it is a question of judicial temperament. I think that Mr. Fitzwater at this time in his career and at this time in his life lacks the judicial temperament to be placed upon the Federal bench for the rest of his life, making judgments that affect a significant portion of this country's population.

Mr. President, some might suggest that since we had a vote of 66 to 33, this is a futile exercise. Well, I suggest to my colleagues that, on occasion, Federal judges, before they are put on the bench and after they are put on the bench, are affected by or sensitized to certain concerns as a consequence of what they have been exposed to. I have no illusion that my vote is going to produce enough votes to defeat Mr. Fitzwater's nomination. If he is put on the bench, as I fully expect to happen, I am not going to go home and not be able to sleep tonight. There are several people coming up about whom I will feel that way. But I will not go home and fail to go to sleep. I will decide what I think is my responsibility, and I will go home with the hope that Mr. Fitzwater will be made aware of what I and other Members have said here and take that into consideration as he grows in stature on the bench, because grow he must in order to be able to fulfill that high responsibility—not grow intellectually, but the maturation process he must go through is one to understand a little more the history of his State and the country and the nature of the fight and the deep concern of tens of millions of Americans about people like him who look at signs like that and say, "I don't see any problem."

I thank my colleagues for their consideration, and I thank my colleague from Texas for yielding the floor, to give me an opportunity to speak. I do not intend to speak any more on this matter.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we will not be in much later this evening, but I would like to have an opportunity to meet briefly with the distinguished chairman of the Public Works Committee and the manager of the water bill, S. 1567, Senator ABDNOR, to see where we are in that process.

It is my understanding that we are fairly near completion with one area still under discussion.

I would like to complete action on that measure, if not tonight then at the earliest possible time. I need a little time to discuss that with the manager on this side.

In addition, I understand the House has returned the reconciliation bill. I would like to insist on our amendments and return it to the House yet this evening. I hope we can work that out without a rollcall vote. It seems to me that is one course we could pursue.

Mr. President, if we could have a brief quorum call and have an opportunity to meet with the chairman, Senator STAFFORD, and Senator ABDNOR, I could consult with the distinguished minority leader and get his views on where we may go for the remainder of the evening.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE STATE CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL TO THE SULTANATE OF OMAN

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I have today as my guests from the Consultative Council to the Sultanate of Oman three members of the council. They are here visiting the United States for the purpose of getting a better understanding of our processes. Today they came to my office and I am honored to present them to the Senate at this time.

Oman, as you know, Mr. President, is the country at the southernmost part of the Saudi Arabian Peninsula. It is a good friend and ally of the United States.

RECESS UNTIL 5:26 P.M.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 5 minutes while I introduce the members of the Consultative Council of Oman to the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 5:21 p.m., recessed until 5:26 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. CHAFEE].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSOLIDATED OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 3128.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3128) entitled "An Act to make changes in spending and revenue provisions for purposes of deficit reduction and program improvement, consistent with the budget process.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The motion is agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am advised that there may be an opportunity to work out the minor differences with the House on reconciliation. We have been in contact with the Speaker's office. There are really not that many provisions that are in disagreement. Many people believe that we have almost worked out the so-called 8(g) or OCS provisions. There is some concern on a Medicare provision, one on AFDC, and one on Federal employee benefits. They are about the only three areas in disagreement and none of them are, in my view, major disagreements.

It would seem to me that it is necessary to send this back to the House, and that we are prepared to go to conference. We would rather not have that large gathering. Maybe it can be worked out with the representatives from both sides of the aisle in both the House and the Senate hopefully sometime tomorrow or Thursday.

I thank the distinguished minority leader for clearing this.

Mr. President, there will be no more votes this evening.

We will not be in session much longer.

AUTHORIZING UNITED STATES CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE INTERNATIONAL FUND

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read H.R. 4329 a second time.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4329), to authorize United States contributions to the International Fund established pursuant to the November 15, 1985 agreement between the United Kingdom and Ireland.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I object to any further proceedings under the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

DREDGING THE CLEARWATER RIVER

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I have a letter here that I wish to have printed in the RECORD today in case any questions come up. There has been a great deal of interest in this water bill in my State. It is my understanding that that has been temporarily laid aside. We hope to get it called up next week.

I have a letter from Robert K. Dawson, Assistant Secretary of the Army, Civil Works. There will be a discussion of this letter when we finally get back on the water bill next week. I think we have taken care of a problem which will save one amendment to the water bill next week.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, DC, March 17, 1986.

Hon. STEVEN D. SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: The purpose of this letter is to clarify the Department of the Army's position on dredging the Clearwater River in the vicinity of Lewiston, Idaho. In 1983, the Corps of Engineers, in response to concerns expressed by the Port of Lewiston, initiated studies under the authority of Section 107 of the 1960 river and Harbor Act to determine the feasibility of dredging the Clearwater River to depths adequate for safe navigation.

These efforts resulted in a Reconnaissance Report under Section 107, dated October 1985, which contained an analysis of several alternatives and a recommendation for further studies. The Detailed Project Report which would contain final plan recommendations is scheduled for completion in the near future.

However, additional information recently obtained by the Corps indicates that navigation on the Clearwater River at Lewiston is already authorized. Upon confirmation of this information, the Corps would discontinue its efforts under Section 107 and pursue the desired dredging as a part of its normal operation and maintenance program as budget priorities and funding permit.

If you have further questions regarding this matter, please do not hestiate to contact me.

Sincerely,

ROBERT K. DAWSON,
Assistant Secretary of the Army
(Civil Works).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank B. Sollars, of Ohio, to be a Member of the Board of Directors of the National Consumer Cooperative Bank.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination be confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on House Joint Resolution 534.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution (H.J. Res. 534) entitled "Joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes", and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the further conference requested by the House, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer [Mr. CHAFEE] appointed Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. CHILES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. BUMPERS, and Mr. HARKIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1986, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 17, 1986, during the adjournment of the Senate, received messages from the President of the United States, transmitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

REPORT ON NATIONAL EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO SOUTH AFRICA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING ADJOURNMENT—PM 121

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1986, the Secretary of the Senate, on March 17, 1986, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

On September 9, 1985, in Executive Order 12532 (50 Fed. Reg. 36861, Sept. 10, 1985), I declared a national emergency to deal with the threat posed by the policies and actions of the Government of South Africa to the foreign policy and economy of the United States.

Pursuant to that Order, I prohibited certain transactions, including the following: (1) the making or approval of bank loans to the South African Government, with certain narrow exceptions; (2) the export of computers and related goods and technology to certain government agencies and any apartheid enforcing entity of the South African Government; (3) nuclear exports to South Africa and related transactions, with certain narrow exceptions; (4) the import into the United States of arms, ammunition, or military vehicles produced in South Africa; and (5) the extension of export marketing support to U.S. firms employing at least twenty-five persons in South Africa which do not adhere to certain fair labor standards.

In addition, I directed (6) the Secretary of State and the United States Trade Representative to consult with other parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with a view toward adopting a prohibition on the import of Krugerrands; (7) the Secretary of the Treasury to complete a study within 60 days regarding the feasibility of minting U.S. gold coins; (8) the Secretary of State to take the steps necessary to increase the amounts provided for scholarships in South Africa for those disadvantaged by the system of apartheid and to increase the amounts allocated for South Africa in the Human Rights Fund; and (9) the Secretary of State to establish an Advisory Committee to provide recommendations on measures to encourage peaceful change in South Africa.

The declaration of emergency was made pursuant to the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq., and the National Emergencies Act, 50 U.S.C. 1601 et seq. I submitted a report regarding the declaration to the Congress on September 9, 1985, pursuant to Section 204(b) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act. Pursuant to Section 204(c) of that act, I am today reporting on the major actions taken in the exercise of the authorities contained in that act and Executive Order 12532. The following actions are listed in chronological order, and a copy of all implementing rules and regulations is enclosed.

On October 1, 1985, in Executive Order 12535, I prohibited the importation of the South African Krugerrands into the United States effective October 11, 1985 (50 Fed. Reg. 40325, Oct. 3, 1985). This Order implemented the course of action contemplated in Section 5(a) of Executive Order 12532.

On October 7, 1985, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and firearms of the Department of the Treasury issued regulations on the Importation of Articles on the United States Munitions Import List (50 Fed. Reg. 42157, Oct. 18, 1985). These regulations implemented the prohibition of certain arms imports contained in Section 1(d) of Executive Order 12532.

On October 9, 1985, the Office of Foreign Assets Control of the Department of the Treasury issued the South African Transactions Regulations (50 Fed. Reg. 41682, Oct. 15, 1985). These regulations implemented the ban on the importation of the Krugerrand.

On October 22, 1985, the Department of State published a notice in the Federal Register regarding the Establishment of the Advisory Committee on South Africa (50 Fed. Reg. 42817, Oct. 22, 1985). The Charter of the Advisory Committee has been filed with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and the Library of Congress. The Committee shall render a report to the Secretary of State within one year of its first meeting, which was held on January 29-30.

On November 4, 1985, the Department of State issued proposed regulations for public comment on South Africa and Fair Labor Standards (50 Fed. Reg. 46455, Nov. 8, 1985). The draft regulations were designed to implement the fair labor provisions stated in Section 2 of Executive Order 12532. Final regulations were issued by the Department of State on December 23, 1985 (50 Fed. Reg. 53308, Dec. 31, 1985).

On November 6, 1985, the Office of Foreign Assets Control of the Department of the Treasury issued the South African Transactions Regulations (50 Fed. Reg. 46726, Nov. 12, 1985). These regulations implemented the bank loan prohibition of Section 1(a) of Executive Order 12532.

On November 8, 1985, the Secretary of the Treasury submitted a report on the feasibility of minting U.S. gold coins. On December 17, 1985, I signed the Gold Bullion Coin Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-185), which requires the minting of such coins.

On November 14, 1985, the International Trade Administration of the Department of Commerce issued regulations on Export Controls on the Republic of South Africa (50 Fed. Reg. 47363, Nov. 18, 1985). These regulations implemented the computer export prohibition in Section 1(b) and the prohibition against licensing exports to nuclear production and utilization facilities in Section 1(c) of Executive Order 12532.

The policies and actions of the Government of South Africa continue to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the foreign policy and economy of the United States. I shall continue to exercise the powers at my disposal to apply the measures contained in Executive Order 12532 as long as these measures are appropriate, and will continue to report periodically to the Congress on significant developments pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 1703(c).

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-603. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

RESOLUTION

"Whereas, ending the starvation in Africa requires thirty million tons a year of cereal and animal and vegetable protein foods from outside the continent for three years; and

"Whereas, worldwide food supplies per capita are shrinking dangerously and annual world grain production has declined from eighteen bushels per capita to fifteen bushels per capita when every person needs the equivalent of twenty-four bushels per person per year for a healthy diet, including animal protein; and

"Whereas, the agricultural output potential of the developing sector nations is being destroyed through the International Monetary Fund system; and

"Whereas, a small number of world food cartels and private family trusts have consolidated monopoly control over international food, trade, and shipping facilities, domestic food processing, and farm supply companies, and this poses a threat to national and western security because agreements have been made to guarantee Soviet food stocks resulting in food scarcities in the west; and

"Whereas, the potential agricultural production of the globe is enormous if emergency measures are implemented immediately and provision is begun for applying a wave of advanced technologies to developing largescale infrastructure projects such as dams, irrigation systems, ports and to providing cheap, plentiful power. NOW, THEREFORE,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring:

"That the members of the General Assembly of South Carolina hereby memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States:

"1. To ensure emergency food production orders to guarantee resumed livestock development and spring planting, including government-to-government food commodity trade commitments to guarantee cost-of-production parity prices to farmers in all trading partner nations.

"2. To institute investigations and antitrust proceedings against the food, shipping, and chemical cartel companies starting with conflict-of-interest hearings on the role of former cartel executives who occupy positions within the United States Department of Agriculture;

"3. To conduct a national grain and food inventory to produce an accurate public record of national food stocks and total western food supplies, and to set production objectives like the World War II mobilization; and

"4. To provide emergency food to Africa and all other points of need and to supply the logistics and infrastructural assistance needed to allow the most rapid economic development.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the South Carolina Congressional Delegation."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. TRIBLE:

S. 2198. A bill to provide that the full cost-of-living adjustment in benefits payable under certain Federal programs shall be made for 1987; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs,

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS IN CERTAIN FEDERAL PROGRAMS FOR 1987

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will mitigate the severe financial losses incurred by military, civilian, and other Federal retirees.

As my colleagues know, under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation special efforts were made to protect benefits for Social Security recipients and veterans. Cost-of-living adjustments [COLA's] were protected from budget cuts and individuals receiving benefits under these programs were recently provided with COLA's.

However, a significant group of retirees are not protected. COLA's for military, postal, civilian, and other Federal retirees are subject to reduction or elimination.

These retirees have already felt the effects of deficit reduction. COLA's which were scheduled for January 1986 have been eliminated. Individuals covered under these programs—most of whom are senior citizens—were among the first to experience the painful but necessary reality of deficit reduction.

I had hoped that Congress would be able to enact legislation meeting deficit reduction requirements while maintaining the 1986 COLA for all retirees. Regrettably, this did not occur.

The Congress has required military retirees, Federal retirees, Postal Service retirees, and others to go without the 1986 COLA in the name of deficit reduction. Now it is likely that these same people will be denied a 1987 COLA as well.

Such a situation would be unacceptable.

We must all support efforts to reduce the Federal deficit. These efforts, however, must be reasonable and fair.

Fairness dictates that all retirees be treated alike. Federal retirees should not be required to carry the full burden of deficit reduction. Moreover, Federal retirees already yielded the cost-of-living adjustment for 1986 and should not be required to surrender their 1987 COLA's, as well.

The legislation I am introducing today would ensure that military, civilian, postal, and other retirees are treated more fairly in the days ahead. This measure would provide these retirees with 1987 COLA's equal to the COLA provided under the Social Security Program. If Social Security recipients receive a COLA in 1987, other retirees—also senior citizens on fixed incomes—must be provided with the same income protection. Equity demands this.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join with me to ensure fair treatment for all retirees.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for purposes of this Act, the term "cost-of-living adjustment" means any increase or change in the amount of a benefit or in standards relating to such benefit under any provision of Federal law which requires such increase or change as a result of any change in the Consumer Price Index (or any component thereof) or any other index which measures costs, prices, or wages.

SEC. 2. Benefits which are payable in calendar year 1987 under programs listed in section 257(1)(A) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-177; 99 Stat. 1092), including any cost-of-living adjustment in such benefits, shall not be subject to modification, suspension, or reduction in such calendar year pursuant to a Presidential order issued under such Act.

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. NUNN) (by request):

S. 2199. A bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1987 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, for operation and maintenance, and for working capital funds, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 803. Section 2208(j) of title 10, United States Code is repealed.

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
Washington. DC, March 7, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith legislation, "To authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1987 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, for operation and maintenance, and for working capital funds, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces, and for other purposes."

In accordance with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, and section 1405 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986, we are also submitting herewith, as separate legislation, a similar request for authorization of appropriations for fiscal years 1988 and 1989.

These proposals are part of the Department of Defense legislative program for the 99th Congress and the Office of Management and Budget advises that enactment of these proposals would be in accord with the program of the President.

Title I provides procurement authorization for the Military Departments and for the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. It contains a provision that extends for fiscal year 1987 the authority to waive certain costs in connection with the NATO AWACS program.

Title II provides for the authorization of each of the research, development, test, and evaluation appropriations for the Military Departments and the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. The authorization includes a provision that authorizes the appropriation of funds to cover unbudgeted increases as a result of pay, increases for civilian personnel paid from the research, development, test, and evaluation appropriations. It also provides for the authorization of appropriations for the purchase of foreign currencies from the Treasury Department for Department of Defense programs.

Title III provides for authorization of the operation and maintenance appropriations of the Military Departments and the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. The authorization includes a provision that authorizes the appropriation of funds that are necessary to cover unbudgeted increases in fuel costs, unbudgeted civilian pay increases, and unbudgeted inflation in the cost of activities covered by Title III. Title III also includes the authorization of appropriations for the purpose of providing capital for working-capital funds of the Military Departments and the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. It also contains a provision authorizing the appropriation of funds for providing assistance to the 10th International Pan American Games in accordance with section 304 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986.

Title IV prescribes the end strengths for active duty personnel in each component of the Armed Forces as required by section 138(c)(1) of title 10, United States Code, in the numbers provided for by the budget authority and appropriations requested for these components for fiscal year 1987.

Title V provides for end strengths of the Selected Reserve of each reserve component of the Armed Forces in the numbers provided for by the budget authority and appropriations requested for the Department of Defense in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987. Title V also prescribes the end strengths for reserve component members of full-time active duty or full-time National Guard duty for the purpose of administering the reserve forces and provides for an increase in the number of certain enlisted and commissioned personnel who may be serving on active duty in support of the reserve components. Finally, Title V amends section 138(b)(1) of title 10, United States Code, by deleting the reference to authorization of the average strength of the Selected Reserve in accordance with the Department's request for authorization of Selected Reserve strength on the basis of an end strength.

Title VI provides that the provisions of section 138(c)(2) of title 10, United States Code, pertaining to the authorization of a civilian personnel end strength for the Department of Defense shall not be applicable with respect to fiscal year 1987.

Title VII provides for the average military training student loads as required by section 138(d)(1) of title 10, United States Code, in the numbers provided for this purpose in the President's budget for fiscal year 1987.

Title VII consists of three general provisions. Section 801 increases the size of the Special Defense Acquisition Fund by $100,000,000. Section 802 amends the provisions of section 1079(a)(7) of title 10, United States Code, which codified the recurring annual provision formerly in the Appropriation Act pertaining to medical care under the Civilian Health and Medical Program of the Uniformed Services (CHAMPUS). The amendment, which would become effective as of October 1, 1985, deletes the provision relating to reimbursements when a person was covered by an insurance plan that provided at least 75 per cent coverage for the care received and substitutes a provision referring to an insurance plan providing primary coverage for the person's medical care. This will make the codified provision identical to the recurring provision which was amended in the Appropriation Act subsequent to the codification of section 1079(a)(7). Section 803 repeals section 2208(j) of title 10, United States Code, relating to the Industrial Fund Asset Capitalization Program.

Sincerely,

H. LAWRENCE GARRETT III.●

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 2201. A bill to amend the Nuclear Waste Policy Act to provide for increased State participation in selection of sites for characterization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NUCLEAR WASTE STATE PARTICIPATION ACT

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to make two important and needed changes in the Nuclear Waste Policy Act under which our Nation will select, construct, and operate high-level nuclear waste repositories.

In 1982, with the passage of this act, the Senate recognized its responsibility to provide a legislative framework for development of repositories to accept high level nuclear wastes and hold them safely for 10,000 years.

This is clearly a national priority with wide support. Most of this waste is in the form of spent fuel rods that have been stored for nearly 30 years at powerplants across the country, and it is apparent that as the amount of this waste grows, the need for safe, protected repositories increases.

Because of the magnitude of this project, and because with it this Nation is confronted with new engineering problems of immense scope, a great number of safeguards were written into the process. And because of the nature of these projects and the potential ramifications, Congress approved a provision under which any State may veto such a designation within its borders. A vote of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress could override that veto.

In including this provision, the act specifically recognizes the authority of a State to play a critical role in the decision making process. However, under current law this State veto could be used only after characterization by DOE and designation by the President.

Since 1982, and particularly during Environment and Public Works Committee hearings in Texas and in Washington this year, it has become apparent that options regarding the timing of such a State veto must be changed to avoid serious harm to the process and to affected localities.

Characterization is a detailed investigation of a site that will take several years and, according to DOE estimates, will cost up to $1 billion. To the people who live in the area under investigation, the process could be devastating. Once an area is under investigation as a possible site, it is highly likely that land values will decline pending a final decision. Deaf Smith County, TX, one of the most productive agricultural areas in the world, is one of the sites under consideration at this time. Land that is currently used to raise crops would be purchased or leased by DOE and taken out of production. There have been real concerns expressed that grain purchasers may go elsewhere for fear their customers will no longer prefer foods grown in the area.

During characterization, the DOE would bring in personnel and equipment to perform major construction, including digging shafts and excavating tons of salt in the process. There is a legitimate concern that the high winds of the Panhandle may spread salt over the surrounding farmlands.

Even if a site is not selected after characterization, the damage could continue, particularly to an area such as the Texas Panhandle. The area and its crops could be tainted even by being linked to a study of high-level wastes. The land could be disfigured by DOE's activities, and there would be no continued DOE involvement or personnel to maintain whatever short term economic boom which might have occurred. Thus the worst possible outcome for some areas, including the panhandle, may be site characterization. Yet only after characterization could the State attempt to veto the project.

We have already agreed that a State should have the option to veto. I am proposing to permit a State to exercise its veto before characterization. The timing of the veto would be at the discretion of the Governor.

This does not add any new hurdle to the project, and in fact it could save the Federal Government from characterization expenses of $1 billion. We would, of course, maintain the authority of Congress to override any State veto. This is a more orderly method, and it is fair to Federal and State governments, as it is to areas under consideration.

My second proposed change in the Nuclear Waste Policy Act involves the legislative timetable under which the DOE is mandated to do its studies and planning, and to get down to the business of storing radioactive waste.

I ask unanimous consent to include a table outlining major mandated due dates at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAJOR MANDATED DUE DATES NUCLEAR WASTE POLICY ACT OF 1982

Section	Activity	Due date
		Required by act	Actual	Schedule	Delay (months)
112(a)	DOE issues general guidelines for the recommendation of sites for nuclear waste repositories.	July 7, 1983	Dec. 6, 1984		17
121(a)	EPA adopts standards for protection of the environment from off-site releases from repository.	Jan. 7, 1984	August 1985		19
303	DOE submits report to Congress	Jan. 7, 1984	Apr. 18, 1985		15
301(b)1	DOE provides draft Mission Plan	Apr. 7, 1984	May 2, 1984		1
301(b)3	DOE submits Plan to Congress	June 7, 1984	June 1985		12
112	DOE recommends to President three sites for first repository characterization	Jan. 1, 1985		April to May 1986	16
8(b)	President evaluates disposing of defense waste in a commercial repos	Jan. 7, 1985	Apr. 30, 1985		3
114(a)	President to submit recommendation for first repository site to Congress	Mar. 31, 1987		March 1991	48
114(a)	President to submit recommendations for second repository site	Mar. 31, 1990		March 1998	96
302(a)	DOE to begin receiving spent fuel	Jan. 31, 1998		Jan. 31, 1998	0

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as this table clearly shows, the DOE has consistently fallen behind, or is projected to miss, a large number of important dates under the act. In fact, to this point, DOE has thus far missed every single significant deadline and continues to announce further delays.

I am not overly critical of this because the subject matter demands great caution. As I said earlier, we are breaking new ground in locating these repositories, and we cannot take chances. However, these latest projections, covering the time period between this year and 1998, indicate that DOE plans to compress the intermediate steps in order to meet the 1998 deadline.

The last thing we should do at this point is to cut corners on licensing, characterization, and construction to meet an arbitrary deadline. The key to the success of a project of this magnitude is the credibility of DOE, and it is difficult to understand why DOE would risk its credibility by appearing to rush ahead at the most crucial point. There is simply no way to regain that lost time without further eroding public confidence in DOE's ability to make informed, objective decisions.

Therefore, I am proposing that DOE be given 10 additional years from the current 1998 deadline to begin receiving spent fuel. Stretching out these deadlines would permit more and better consideration at each stage of this important process, and more time for corrections and reevaluations.

The elimination of this compressed schedule is crucial in assuring the public that all possible real or perceived problems in the repository process have been worked out. Without the acceptance and support of the public, and without a clear demonstration of a safe, proper location and an unquestioned process, by DOE, I am doubtful that our storage plans for the future can be successful.

I ask unanimous consent to insert the bill at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2202. A bill to award a special gold medal to the family of Harry Chapin; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL TO THE FAMILY OF HARRY CHAPIN

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Harry Chapin—close friend, singer, artist, and champion of the world's hungry—tragically left us over 4 years ago.

His vision for a world less hungry and unjust remains not only in his songs but through the fruits of his many philanthropic efforts. He was the moving force behind the creation of the President's Commission on World Hunger. He founded the Food Policy Center, created World Hunger Year and established Food Monitor magazine.

Harry Chapin's determination and commitment to get to the root causes of hunger is the reason why many of us—Republicans and Democrats—believe that an appropriate gold medal be awarded to Harry Chapin's family in commemoration of his selfless crusade. This medal, awarded posthumously, would signal bipartisan support for the struggle Harry waged.

He knew the enormity of his job. He knew that people all around the world would continue to suffer unless hunger became a matter of conscience to the millions of us who can make a difference. He was not deterred by the magnitude of the problem.

There is now an empty space where there was once his endless energy and contagious enthusiasm for ending world hunger.

Harry Chapin was an outstanding example of what a citizen should be, and those of us who worked closely with him over the years still miss him deeply. It is entirely appropriate to award his family a gold medal for his work to alleviate suffering. The world was made better by Harry Chapin. He must never be forgotten.

By Mr. STAFFORD (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. HART, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. PELL, and Mr. DODD):

S. 2203. A bill to establish a program to reduce acid deposition and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

NEW CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, today, I and several Members of the Senate are introducing a bill to establish an acid rain control program. This proposal marks, in my judgment, a turning point in the acid rain debate.

The Committee on Environment and Public Works has reported an acid rain control bill during each of the last two Congresses. Unfortunately, both died without being brought before the full Senate.

But this bill is different from earlier versions in several important respects.

First, it deals with a variety of air pollutants, not just one or two.

Second, it creates a program for the entire United States, not just a portion of it.

Third, it deals not just with electric powerplants, but with cars and trucks as well.

These are important differences, but they are not what causes me to say that we have reached a turning point in acid rain controls.

This is a sweeping and ambitious proposal; it is also expensive. The Office of Technology Assessment has estimated a maximum cost of $6 billion annually for the powerplant portions of the legislation.

Three years ago, the introduction of such a proposal would have been almost unthinkable. What makes today a turning point is not only that such a bill can be introduced, but that a considerable number of Senators take it seriously.

More importantly, scientists across the United States and throughout the world will say that this is the kind of bill which should be put before the Congress. Engineers will say that it is the kind of bill which can be implemented, not 5 years from now but today.

This is a bill which science tells us should be introduced and which technology tells can be implemented.

Additionally, politicans throughout the world are finally beginning to believe them.

For example, this bill's approach to cutting pollution from powerplants is based on what the West Germans have adopted. Its proposals for tough controls for oxides of nitrogen are based on what the Japanese have already done. And its suggestion that the tailpipe standards for our cars and trucks should be toughened is spurred in part by decisions in Switzerland, Austria, Sweden, and Canada to finally impose mobile source controls in their countries.

All of this is happening because the case against air pollution generally and acid rain in particular is becoming clearer and clearer everywhere in the world. Lakes and forests are dying, buildings are being destroyed, and human health is at risk.

Not all of these have necessarily happened in the United States. But just a few days ago the National Academy of Sciences said lakes had been killed in New York because of acid rain. And in North Carolina, red spruce in the mountains are dying and there is a clear correlation to air pollution.

It is not just a small band of environmental extremists who say this is a problem. Reputable scientists virtually everywhere are telling us the same thing, whether it's Canada, the United States, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Poland, or a dozen other countries.

The United States took some action when it enacted the old Clean Air Act in 1970 and again in 1977. But that is not enough. Those were good laws for the times and they worked. But they're not good enough now.

Just a few days ago I received a letter confirming that in 1984, after years of declining, pollution levels of both sulphur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen had increased. The increases were about 900,000 tons and 650,000 tons respectively.

Many people are probably unaware of the fact that in less than 9 months up to 32 areas of the country will have failed to meet the deadlines for achieving ozone air pollution levels that are safe to breathe. Literally tens of millions of Americans will continue to be exposed to air which is a danger to their health.

We can be proud in the United States. Ours was the first country to recognize the danger which air pollution posed and to take aggressive action. But that was 17 years ago. Today, we are not the first to act, but the last. Only one other industrialized country in the world has failed to commit itself on acid rain. That is Great Britain. Short of that, the United States is isolated in the international community on this subject.

I do not believe this will continue. The Congress—not just one or two committees—will act and in my judgment act soon. It may be too late in this legislative year to expect final legislative action in 1986. But I will certainly shoot for that and, if we fail, start again early next year.

Let me just conclude by saying that we've turned a corner in this country on the subject of controlling acid rain. It is no longer just a question of whether, but when and how. My hope is that it will be this bill and this year.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, we are here, once again, to introduce acid rain control legislation. I congratulate the distinguished chairman of our Environment Committee, Senator STAFFORD, on the outlines of this new bill. And I am sure that I speak for other members of the committee in thanking him for his continuing dedication and leadership in this endeavor. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this bill.

This legislation outlines a very different approach to solve the acid rain problem. Bills considered and reported by the Environment Committee in the past have focused almost exclusively on stationary sources of sulphur dioxide emissions. This bill would include significant controls on mobile sources, as well, with new standards for nitrogen oxide, hydrobarbon, carbon monoxide, and particulate emissions.

I believe that the inclusion of controls on mobile sources is an important step forward in the American debate on acid rain. This past summer, I had the opportunity to travel to several areas in Scandinavia and Western Europe where air pollution is clearly damaging lakes and forests. Today there is an environmental crisis in the Black Forest of West Germany, a crisis which is spreading to other parts of that nation and among its neighbors. it is clear to the scientists and government leaders of West Germany that the automobile is a big factor in the "Waldsterben—forest death" that has been evident over the past 4 or 5 years in that country.

Here in the United States we are beginning to see the signs of similar damage to our forests. At higher elevations in North Carolina and Vermont there are some areas where damage has reached levels similar to that which I saw in Europe. And recent reports indicate that growth rates in our commercial forests in the Southeast have slowed dramatically over the past 20 to 30 years.

We have done much more than the Europeans to control emissions from automobiles. They have no equivalent to our Clean Air Act with its mobile source standards. Their automobile fleet is not equipped with catalytic converters and still burns leaded gasoline. And they have no required fuel economy standards as we have in the United States. So our auto industry has already been asked to do much to combat air pollution. And let me say that the success of the Clean Air Act can be experienced. Air quality on the European Continent was noticeably worse than it is here in the United States.

Nevertheless, American automobiles are still a major source of air pollution and evidence is gathering that this pollution, particularly ozone and especially at higher elevations, may be responsible for serious damage to our forest resources. The bill that Senator STAFFORD is introducing today will certainly have the effect of focusing the legislative discussions on the role of mobile sources in the continuing air pollution problems of this, the American continent.

This bill is different from past acid rain control bills in another way, as well. In past legislation, the committee has adopted an explicit goal of reducing sulfur dioxide emissions by 10 million tons over 10 years and allocated those reductions among the 31 States east of the Mississippi River. The reductions ordered by the previous legislation would have been accomplished by amending State implementation plans. Presumably the States would have ordered some electric utility powerplants to switch to low sulfur coal, to scrub their coal, or to install flue gas scrubbers to achieve the mandated reductions.

Under the legislation introduced today, the reductions would be achieved by the direct imposition of Federal emissions standards on stationary sources of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions. This is certainly a new approach to acid rain control legislation. It will make the program a 50-State program. And it will avoid the uncertainty and time delays that were implicit in the translation of a national goal for emissions reductions through State implementation plans and then into specific clean up orders. There are many advantages to this direct approach.

But making it a direct Federal emissions regulation covering the whole Nation still does not solve the problem that has prevented the Senate from dealing with acid rain in the past. The cost of the cleanup effort still falls disproportionately on a few States while the principal benefits of the program would be realized in other regions of the country. Whether we take the control approach reflected in this new bill, or return to the allocated reductions that have been advocated by Senator MITCHELL in the past, we will still need to address the problem of allocating the cost of controls across the Nation.

Mr. President, in the 98th Congress I introduced legislation that would pay for an acid rain control program by imposing an emissions tax on stationary sources and an excise tax on automobiles to raise $40 billion over a 10-year period. These tax revenues would have gone into a trust fund to be used by EPA to purchase sulfur dioxide emissions reductions at industrial facilities where the most reductions could be achieved for the least cost. It is my intention to introduce that legislation again this Congress as the Environment Committee prepares for hearings and markup on amendments to the Clean Air Act.

So, Mr. President, we begin anew the debate on acid rain here in the Senate. I wish to again commend Senator STAFFORD for bringing us this thoughtful and innovative legislation. By joining as cosponsors, I and other members of the committee make clear our continuing commitment to find a remedy for the acid rain problem which damages so many important environmental resources in large areas of our Nation.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, it should come as no surprise that those of us introducing this bill today are advocates of an acid rain control program. We have sponsored such legislation in the past and will continue to press the issue.

Recent reports that the President will endorse his special envoy's recommendation for action to curb acid rain is a welcomed sign. It is an acknowledgement by the President that the acid rain problem is a real problem and a serious one. Unfortunately, the President's plan will do little to solve the problem. It is little more than a plan for more studies. Acceptance of the special envoy's plan will not reduce the pressure to adopt concrete programs to curb the damage.

We know enough to act and must act to reduce pollution that causes acid rain. Since we first developed acid rain control legislation in 1979 and 1980, report after report has proven the case for imposition of controls.

A report released early last year concluded that four out of five of Rhode Island's cleanest waterways are either dying or being endangered by acid rain. At least two have acid levels high enough to kill fish.

A report released last week by the National Academy of Sciences concluded that a "causal relationship" does link sulfur emissions from the burning of fossil fuels with acid rain and increased levels of acid in lakes and streams.

The bill we are introducing today is based on scientific evidence that has been developed since 1979. This new information tells us not only that our original proposals were sound but that we were being too conservative.

This new bill is a departure from earlier proposals in several important respects.

First, this bill attempts to control a variety of air pollutants in a variety of ways. In the past, attention in both the Congress and the press has focused on one specific pollutant—sulfur dioxide. But the great research progress we've made in the past years has not only made the case against sulfur dioxide more convincing, but implicated other airborne chemicals as well. Therefore, this bill proposes reductions not only of sulfur dioxide, but also oxides of nitrogen, ozone, hydrocarbons, and carbon monoxide.

Second, the focus of this bill is not only on the damage which acid rain and other air pollution is doing to lakes and streams, but also on soils, forests, crops, building materials, and human health. There is little, if any, doubt that all of these are now at risk in the debate over what is conventionally referred to as "acid rain".

Third, because the bill attempts to deal with more pollutants and more damages, it also would cover the entire United States, not just a region. Previous bills have suggested that control efforts be limited to a certain number of States. But evidence now shows that our concerns should be continental, not regional.

Finally, the bill does not rely on any given technology or approach, nor does it suggest that the total pollution reductions should be a set amount. Previous bills have suggested a reduction of 8, 10, or even 12 million tons of sulfur dioxide emissions as a target. This bill suggests that instead of establishing a specific number, the Nation should commit itself to curbing pollution as much as possible through approaches which already exist. In that sense, this bill is a true "state of the art" proposal.

For example, the pollution produced by many American powerplants could be cut in half by either switching to clean American coal or installing devices already in operation in countries like Japan. Similarly, if all cars sold in the United States were as clean as 25 percent of the models now being built and sold—built and sold by United States companies, I might add, not just their Japanese or European competitors—acid-based and other air pollution would drop dramatically.

For 7 years, the Congress has been engaged in a debate called acid rain, with the common belief that the pollutants are new and so are the arguments. In fact, both the pollutants and the debates are echoes from the 1960's and the 1970's and even earlier.

What has changed since then is the level of scientific certainty. Acid rain not only can but has killed lakes and streams, as well as other damage. One scientific report after another has made this so clear that if the Congress were a court of law, the jury could have no difficulty returning a verdict of guilty.

It has become increasingly clear that more is at stake here than just lakes and streams. The Congress thought 16 years ago that the stakes were the trees, crops, and very lives of Americans, and on that basis we enacted the Clean Air Act. Today science has indicated that those judgments of 16 years ago were not only correct, but that the Congress did not go far enough. Much—much more—is now needed, and the acid rain debate has made this clear.

We have made great progress in the United States chiefly because of laws enacted in the 1970's to meet challenges which arose in the 1950's and 1960's. This is a new era and it demands new solutions.

That is what this bill suggests:

All powerplants should be as clean as those few which now utilize the fuels and technology of 1986.

All cars and trucks should be as clean as the few built with the computers and engines of 1986.

And all citizens should be protected from the pollution produced by these smokestacks and exhaust pipes.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I am joining Senator STAFFORD in introducing a new approach to the control of acid rain—a recognition of Western acid rain and a national approach to the problem.

Acidic deposition and ecological consequences first received widespread attention in Scandinavia in the late 1960's and early 1970's.

By the early- to mid-1970's, scientists found that precipitation falling on Eastern North America was acidic.

Acid-sensitive species such as trout declined or were eliminated in many lakes and streams in the Adirondacks and New England.

While there seemed to be a correlation between areas experiencing acid precipitation being located downwind of regions where anthropogenic emissions were high, neither the mechanism nor the extent of the problem was fully understood.

Congress became sufficiently concerned by the late 1970's to begin calling for a reduction in emissions from large sources of sulfur dioxide. Although the Environment and Public Works Committee has reported legislation in the past to address this problem, Congress has failed to act.

The approach in previous Congresses was confined largely to addressing emissions of sulfur dioxide. The problem was considered a regional problem. Its solution was directed solely at the Eastern United States.

While Congress has been unable to agree on a program to reduce emissions, research into the problem has continued.

The research demonstrated that action needs to be taken now.

NORTH AMERICAN PROBLEM

What was once thought to be a phenomenon occuring in a limited areas of the Eastern United States has been found to be threatening the entire country. A national and international solution involving all North America is needed.

High elevation Western areas may actually be more sensitive to acidic deposition than sites in Eastern North America and Europe.

The larger fraction of precipitation falling as snow in the mountains of the West means that high elevation areas are at increased risk when spring snow melt can send acid shock to fragile alpine ecosystems.

Many of these extremely sensitive areas in the West occur at high elevation sites. These sites are characterized by short growing seasons, shallow soils, and steep terrain. These factors combine to decrease the ability of the area to neutralize acidic precipitation. Once acid rain deposition occurs, rapid chemical changes could be manifest in the soils and surface waters of the area.

Compounding this problem is the much higher ratio of dry to wet acid deposition in the West. Thus, there is increased risk of underestimating the total stress being exerted on an ecosystem.

Particularly vulnerable areas are the Rocky Mountains, the Cascades, and the Sierra Nevadas.

In my own State of Montana, large areas of the western part of the State are threatened. These areas include two of the "Crown Jewels" of our National Park System: Glacier and Yellowstone National Parks.

REAL CONCERN—TRANSPORTED AIR POLLUTANTS

What was once considered a problem caused solely by uncontrolled emissions of sulfur dioxide has been found to be caused by a whole host of air pollutants.

In the past, little attention was given to emissions of nitrous oxides. After all, nitrogen is a plant nutrient and, therefore, was not thought to be a villain.

While nitrous oxide was briefly considered and then set aside, other pollutants such as ozone, hydrocarbons, and carbon monoxide were not even considered.

As we looked closer and gained a better understanding of the "dieback" of our forests both here in Eastern North America and in Europe, it became apparent that each of these pollutants is important to understand the scope and severity of the problem.

The goal can no longer be the narrow objective of reducing sulfur dioxide emissions. Rather, the real concern is transported air pollutants. We must move toward reduced emissions of all pollutants if we are to protect public health and the environment in this country.

Legislation being introduced today will place a useful life cn all SO2 sources. After that date, all SO2 sources must come into compliance with a new source performance standard equivalent. This step is needed to ensure that old outdated, high-emitting facilities are replaced.

Increased knowledge points its finger at not just sulfur dioxide emissions, but also nitrous oxide emissions. Steps must be taken to control both stationary and mobile sources of nitrous oxides. By January 1, 1995, best retrofit technology for nitrous oxide emission controls will be required for every major stationary source.

While the immediate concern with synfuels development has been laid aside due to the current world energy situation, we cannot ignore the possibility of massive synfuels development in the West later in this century. This legislation will clarify that mandatory nitrous oxide and sulfur dioxide new source performance standards will be required for these facilities.

While motor vehicles count directly for only one-sixth of the total acid deposition in the Eastern United States, they are responsible for substantially more emissions in the West. Transportation accounts for approximately half of all anthropogenic NOx emissions in the West.

Vehicular pollutants may also play an important catalytic and synergistic role in acidic deposition. Motor vehicles cause or contribute in a major way to ozone, hydrocarbons, total nitrogen, and other transported air pollutants. It is clear that increased control of motor vehicle emissions is essential if we are going to address the problem of transported air pollution, both nationwide and particularly in the West.

Legislation being introduced today will not go beyond what can be achieved today. What it will do is require that light duty vehicle standards be equivalent to the 1986 average certification level of the 25-percent cleanest vehicles. For the 1990 model year, light duty cars must achieve a NO_x standard of 0.25, a hydrocarbon standard of 0.16, a carbon monoxide standard of 1.3, and a particulate standard of 0.18. For light trucks, a nitrous oxide standard of 0.5, a hydrocarbon standard of 0.19, and a carbon monoxide standard of 3. Heavy duty gasoline engines for nonagricultural vehicles must meet a nitrous oxide standard of 5.1, a hydrocarbon standard of 0.48, and a carbon monoxide standard of 2.5. Heavy duty diesel engines must meet a nitrous oxide standard of 5.1, a hydrocarbon standard of 0.54, and a carbon monoxide standard of 1.7. All new vehicles must have a warranty of emission systems for 10 years or 100,000 miles. By January 1, 1988, a mandatory visible inspection system to ensure against tampering and misfueling must be in place in all 50 States. Diesel fuel sulfur content must be the same as the content in gasoline.

These new air emission standards will provide us with the tools necessary to address the problem of transported air pollutants.

But, these controls in the United States alone will not be enough to protect the West. Recently, a new smelter has begun testing 30 miles south of Arizona in Mexico. This smelter, known as the Nacozari smelter, is coming online with no emissions controls. It has already begun test operation. Over the next 18 months, this smelter will become the largest single source of sulfur dioxide emissions in North America. Its emissions can be expected to be felt from the southern border with Mexico all the way to our northern border with Canada.

It is clear that the problem of transported air pollutants cannot be looked at as an isolated national problem. It is a problem of international scope. While addition of emission controls in this country can reduce the problem, it can only truly succeed in meeting its goal if a North American Treaty is in place.

This legislation builds on legislation that I introduced during the first session of this Congress calling on the President to negotiate a North American Treaty on Air Pollution. This treaty will ensure that future emissions emanating in Mexico or Canada will not adversely affect the West. Similarly, emissions emanating from this country should also not be allowed to adversely affect our neighbors. There is a need for greater coordination, cooperation, and the development of new mechanisms to address an international problem of this scope. If this approach is successful, it can be used as a model for addressing what is rapidly becoming a worldwide problem.

Together, more stringent air quality standards coupled with increased international cooperation will first, lead to the protection of our forests and crops; second, ensure that the Nation's natural environment will be maintained; third, substantially reduce air pollution causing deterioration of our Nation's buildings, bridges, and monuments; and fourth, provide for the protection of public health.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator STAFFORD and my colleagues on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee in introducing this important acid rain control legislation. I am also joining Senator MITCHELL in introducing a series of amendments to S. 283, which he introduced last year, and I cosponsored with the members of the Environment Committee. The legislation that we introduced today differs significantly from legislation previously approved by the committee. It takes account of growing knowledge about the causes of the acid rain, the pollutants involved, and effective mitigation techniques.

The bill extends control requirements to sources emitting not only sulfur and nitrogen oxides, but also hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide. Hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide have been implicated in the chemical transformation of airborne acidic pollutants and in the degradation of forests, crops, and manmade materials. If we are to effectively halt the scourge of acid rain in this country and in Canada, we must address these pollutants as well.

Our legislation also extends acid rain controls to the entire United States. Since the initial introduction of acid rain control legislation in the Senate, evidence has grown of damage and potential harm from acid rain in the Western United States. Today, it would be irresponsible to craft legislation that only addressed pollution sources in the eastern half of the country.

The bill consists of three titles addressing controls on stationary sources, mobile sources, and miscellaneous requirements, including the negotiation of a North American Air Pollution Treaty.

Stationary sources—primarily powerplants—would be required to reduce their sulfur dioxide emissions to a level equivalent to what new plants are required to meet by age 35. Interim reductions are accomplished in a three-tiered fashion, limiting operating hours until plants meet a 1.5-pound-per-million Btu, 0.7-pound-per-million Btu, and ultimately a level equivalent to that required of new plants by age 35. Nitrogen oxide controls on stationary sources are achieved by requiring the installation of the best retrofit technology demonstrated by any member country of OECD by January 1, 1995.

Additional control of nitrogen oxides, hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, and particulates is accomplished through the mobile source title of this legislation. By model year 1990, passenger cars and light duty trucks would be required to meet standards equivalent to the 1986 average certification level of the 25-percent cleanest vehicles. Vehicle pollution control statistics show that a very large number of today's vehicles exceed the levels required by law. This bill strives to adjust existing law to reflect what is already technologically feasible.

Mr. President, we introduce this legislation as a symbol of what can and should be done to control acid rain. It is a bill requiring stringent controls and one that will no doubt draw the attention of the regulated community. I look forward to working closely with my colleagues, the environmental community, and a broad spectrum of organizations and industries to see that this legislation moves expeditiously through the committee and is approved by the 99th Congress.

Mr. President, there could be no more appropriate time to introduce this legislation and send a strong message about the need for real emission controls. This week, the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mulroney, will be meeting with President Reagan for the second Shamrock Summit. Acid rain is sure to be at the top of their agenda.

The legislation we introduce today sets forth a course of action to combat acid rain in this country and in Canada. If enacted, it would serve as a counterpart to the Canadian Acid Rain Program put in place in December of last year. It also calls upon the United States to join with Canada and Mexico to negotiate a tripartite agreement to reduce transboundary air pollution.

Unfortunately, it is not likely that the President will actively support an effective control program within our own borders. It is not likely that he will even agree to negotiate a North American Air Pollution Treaty. Instead, the dangerous game of smoke and mirrors between the leaders of our two countries will continue.

At last year's summit, the President and Mr. Mulroney appointed envoys to study acid rain and report back early this year in preparation for the second summit. While the findings of the envoys report put the administration on the record acknowledging the severity of the acid rain problem, it fell far short of an adequate recommendation.

Now is the time for action on a much larger scale. We do not need additional research to justify a control program. We know that acid rain damage is extensive and is spreading. We know that technology already exists in this country and in other industrialized countries to reduce acid rain. There is no time left for beating around the bush.

Canada has put in place a program to cut its pollution in half. Canada is joined by several European countries, including France and West Germany, in enacting programs to reduce a variety of pollutants, including sulfur dioxide emissions which would be reduced by 50 percent. The U.S.S.R. has joined the so-called 30-percent club—a group of approximately two dozen countries who have pledged to reduce pollution levels to combat acid rain—and agreed in a recent environmental summit with EPA Administrator Lee Thomas to work on solutions to the acid rain problem plaguing both our countries.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important legislation on the eve of the second Shamrock Summit and send a strong message to the President that much more must be done to reduce transboundary air pollution.

By Mr. McCLURE (by request):

S. 2204. A bill to amend the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, as amended, to permit the use of park entrance, admission, and recreation use fees for the operation of the National Park System, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM ENTRANCE FEE ACT

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send to the desk legislation which was transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior and referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. The legislation would modify the current provisions of law relating to ability of the National Park Service to charge entrance and use fees at various units of the National Park System.

This legislation is far better than the proposals which were under consideration by the administration in the past. I have stated that I am not opposed to reviewing the current limitations and that I think some increase could probably be accommodated. I am very concerned, however, with the unfettered discretion which this draft proposes. I do not think that current budget concerns should be an excuse to subordinate proper management of the resources of the national parks to economics. I also want to ensure that park operations and maintenance are not held hostage to either increased visitation or a certain level of fees.

As I stated, this legislation is a marked improvement over previous proposals and the Secretary should be commended for those improvements. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the transmittal letter, a section-by-section analyses and the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2204

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "National Park System Entrance Fee Act of 1986."

SEC. 2. Section 4(a) of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, as amended (16 U.S.C. 460*l*-6a(a)), is further amended as follows:

(1) The first sentence is amended by changing the period to a comma and inserting thereafter the following: "except that any unit which provides significant outdoor recreation opportunities in an urban environment and to which access is publicly available at multiple locations may not be so designated."

(2) Paragraph (1) is amended by striking out "$10" and inserting in lieu thereof "$40" in the first sentence.

(3) Paragraph (1) is further amended by striking out "(1)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1)(A)" and adding the following new subparagraph:

"(B) For admission into a specific designated unit of the National Park System, or into several specific units located in a particular geographic area, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make available an annual admission permit for a reasonable fee. The permit shall convey the privileges of, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as, the Golden Eagle Passport, except that it shall be valid only for admission into the specific unit or units of the National Park System indicated at the time of purchase.".

(4) Paragraph (4) is amended by striking out "without charge" and inserting in lieu thereof "for a fee of $10" in the second sentence, and by striking out "other" in the third sentence.

SEC. 3. Section 4 of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, as amended (16 U.S.C. 460*l*-6a), is further amended as follows:

(1) Subsection (e) is amended by adding the following after the final period: "When authorized by the head of the collecting agency, volunteers may sell permits and collect fees authorized or established pursuant to this section, and funds appropriated or otherwise available to the collecting agency shall be available to cover the cost of any surety bond as may be required of any such volunteer in performing such authorized services under this subsection.".

(2) Subsection (f) is amended by striking out "(f) Except" and inserting in lieu thereof "(f)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) and except"; and by adding the following new paragraph:

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, for the period ending ten years from the effective date of this paragraph, 80 per centum of all receipts collected from fees or permits for admission or entrance to the National Park System, and 80 per centum of all fees collected under subsections (b) and (c) of this section with respect to the National Park System, shall be available until expended, without further appropriation, for expenditure as determined by the Secretary, for operation of the National Park System. During such period 20 per centum of all such receipts and fees with respect to the National Park System shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

SEC. 4. Section 402 of the Act of October 12, 1979 (93 Stat. 664), is hereby repealed.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. Short title.

Section 2. Amends section 4(a) of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, which authorizes entrance or admission fees only to designated units of the National Park System and at National Recreation Areas administered by the Department of Agriculture, as follows:

(1) Exempts urban recreation areas to which access is publicly available at multiple locations from being designated as entrance fee units.

(2) Increases the price of the annual general admission permit, the "Golden Eagle Passport," from $10 to $40.

(3) Provides for an annual admission permit for a specific park or several specific parks in a particular geographic area. This annual permit would be similar to the Golden Eagle Passport, but limited to the specific park or parks indicated at the time of purchase.

(4) Provides for a one-time $10 charge for the Golden Age Passport, which is now free to citizens 62 years and older.

Section 3. Amends two additional subsections of section 4 of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, as follows:

(1) Amends subsection (e) to authorize volunteers to collect entry and user fees, and authorizes collecting agency to pay any surety bond.

(2) Makes available, without further appropriation, 80 percent of all entrance and user fees collected by the National Park Service for the next 10 years for expenditure as determined by the Secretary, for the operation of the National Park System.

The Secretary would have the discretion to establish amounts that would stay with the collecting park and the amounts that would be distributed among all areas, based on need. The funds would remain available until expended. The remaining 20 percent of all National Park System fees collected during the 10-year period would be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Section 4. Repeals 1979 provision that froze all National Park System entrance fees and prohibited the Secretary from charging for transportation systems at Denali National Park, AK.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, DC, March 10, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed is a draft bill "To amend the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965, as amended, to permit the use of park entrance, admission, and recreation use fees for the operation of the National Park System, and for other purposes." Also enclosed is a brief section-by-section analysis of the bill.

We recommend that the bill be introduced and referred to the appropriate committee for consideration, and we recommend that it be enacted.

The fee initiative proposed by this bill represents one of the highest priorities for the National Park Service in the FY 1987 budget. This bill would provide a 10-year constant source of funds for the enhancement of operational activities in the National Park System, including interpretation, maintenance, research, and resource management and protection. Given the pressing need to reduce the Federal deficit, we propose to use the fees generated by the parks themselves to increase the level of funding for park operations.

Many of the 332,500,000 visitors to the parks in 1984 paid entrance, campground, and other user fees in the belief that their money was going to directly benefit the resources and services within the park. Under current law, however, entrance and user fees generated by the National Park Service are deposited into the Land and Water Conservation Fund where they are available for appropriation by Congress for grants to States for park acquisition and development and for Federal land acquisition. Under the enclosed bill, 80 percent of all fees collected in the parks would remain with the Secretary of the Interior for use by the National Park Service. Thus, the park visitor would know that 80 cents of every dollar charged for admission or camping and similar services would directly benefit the resources of the parks.

Park entrance fees have remained essentially at the same level for 14 years. In Fiscal Year 1985, more than $21 million was collected by the National Park Service in entrance and user fees under a system in which most entrance fees, including the Golden Eagle Passport, had not been changed since 1972. We believe that if park users can be sure their money will go directly to the park system, they will not object to reasonable increases in entrance fees or expanding the number of parks at which such fees are charged. Accordingly, the second major feature of the bill is a repeal of the 1979 statutory prohibition on increasing park entrance fees or establishing new fees.

We would like to emphasize that, under our proposal:

No entrance fee will be charged where such a fee is now specifically prohibited by law; the draft bill contains no park-specific repealers on entrance fees.

No entrance fee in excess of $10 per vehicle will be charged.

No entrance fee will be charged at urban recreation areas where access is publicly available at multiple locations.

No change will be made to existing policies regarding free or reduced entrance fees for bona fide educational groups.

The price of the Golden Eagle Passport will be increased from $10 to $40, and it will continue to be an annual unlimited vehicular admission permit to any unit of the National Park System. In addition, the bill would authorize a one-time charge of $10 for the Golden Age Passport, which is now free to citizens 62 years of age and older. It would also authorize volunteers to collect fees and sell permits. For people who visit one park regularly, the bill would authorize that annual admission permits for specific parks or several specific parks in a geographic area be offered.

Under our proposal, we estimate that $52 million in additional revenues in FY 1987 would be generated from increased entrance fees. Combined with an estimated $22 million from current entrance and user fee collections, this would provide an estimated total of $74 million in revenues. Further, 80%, or $59 million, would be available for enhanced operations of our national parks and the remaining 20%, or $15 million, would be deposited into the general fund as a contribution to deficit reduction. We believe that the effect of this proposal will enable the National Park Service to provide levels of service that the American people want and expect in their national parks even in this time of fiscal austerity.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that this legislative proposal is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

DONALD PAUL HODEL.●

By Mr. NICKLES (for himself and Mr. BOREN):

S. 2205. A bill to eliminate certain restrictions on the use of natural gas and petroleum, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. NICKLES (for himself, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. HECHT):

S. 2206. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to repeal the windfall profit tax on crude oil; to the Committee on Finance.

REPEAL OF FUEL USE ACT AND WINDFALL PROFIT TAX

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce two bills whose passage is long overdue: the repeal of both the Fuel Use Act and the windfall profit tax.

Our national energy policies of the past decade have hurt more than helped the American consumer and our domestic energy industry. The American energy industry has been the whipping boy of Congress for decades, mostly, I believe, because there has been great misunderstanding of what makes the industry operate.

For example, the windfall profit tax has taken more than $77 billion from the domestic energy industry since 1980. No other single industry in the United States has a windfall profit tax. This tax is a tremendous disincentive for domestic producers, but a strong encouragement for importers of foreign oil on which there is no equivalent tax. It has also acted to raise consumer oil prices, as well.

An equally punitive energy policy is the Fuel Use Act. Enacted in 1978 in reaction to nationwide fears of what appeared to be a natural gas shortage, the act has done nothing more than increase consumer energy costs and discourage our domestic gas production.

The real irony is that there has never been a shortage of natural gas. In fact, the shortage of the 1970's was caused by Government regulations which acted as a severe disincentive to producers.

Both laws desperately need to be repealed.

Repealing the windfall profit tax today would likely cost the Federal Government absolutely nothing. According to a Congressional Research Service analysis, when the price of oil per barrel drops below $19.40 for tier one, $22.60 for tier two, and $29 for tier three, the windfall profits tax is no longer collected. With few exceptions, the price of oil has been below these figures all year.

Repealing the windfall profits tax would, at minimum, send a positive signal to our domestic energy industry at a time when positive signals are few and far between. In the long run, repeal would help an industry that employs millions of Americans regain lost ground, and put domestic producers on even footing with foreign producers.

Repealing the Fuel Use Act would immediately bolster a depressed natural gas industry. We have gas in Oklahoma that we can't sell. Gas wells by the dozens are being shut down. The price of gas at the wellhead has dropped substantially in the last couple of years. Repealing the Fuel Use Act would not only help the industry but also provide consumers with the best energy buy in the world today.

As chairman of the Energy Regulation Subcommittee, I plan to hold hearings on April 10 to examine the prospects for repealing the Fuel Use Act. Repealing this act would be a strong first step to regaining a sound national energy policy.

As my colleagues know, our domestic energy industry needs every bit of help and encouragement the Federal Government can provide. And the quickest way this body could act to aid that industry is by repealing current laws which are nothing but an impediment for both consumers and producers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2206

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 45 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to windfall profit tax on domestic crude oil) is hereby repealed.

(b) The repeal made by this Act shall apply with respect to taxable periods beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am glad to join with my colleague from Oklahoma to introduce legislation that has long been needed. It is time that we repeal the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978, more commonly known as the Fuel Use Act. Our proposed legislation will amend the Fuel Use Act to repeal end use restrictions on the use of natural gas and petroleum.

The common belief at the time the Fuel Use Act was originally passed was that we as a nation were running out of natural gas. In reality Mr. President, we have developed a natural gas surplus. This surplus when coupled with falling petroleum prices, eliminates any potential impact on consumers from the repeal of the Fuel Use Act.

Currently, the act still contains prohibitions on the use of natural gas by new baseload powerplants and industrial installations. Unfortunately, utilities and industrial users cannot make rational business plans involving the use of natural gas. There are utility power plants in my home State that are forced to burn coal, brought in from other States, while they stand in the shadows of shut-in gas wells. Who benefits from that kind of regulation? The producers do not benefit and consumers certainly don't benefit. In fact Mr. President, residential consumers stand to lose the most if we fail to use this opportunity to repeal the Fuel Use Act. Industrial users have a greater capacity to switch to other fuels than do residential consumers. Therefore, as the price of residual fuel oil falls, and becomes a cheaper source of energy in relation to natural gas, industrial user of natural gas will switch. Thus the demand for natural gas declines and the local natural gas distribution companies are forced to raise the rates for residential consumers.

The benefit to the public from the enactment of our bill will be lower prices to the consumer, more competition in the industry, and a cleaner environment from the use of natural gas.●

S.J. Res. 297. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 20, 1986, as "Crime Victims Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CRIME VICTIMS WEEK

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today legislation which would designate the week of April 20, 1986, as "Crime Victims Week."

One of the fundamental obligations of government is to protect its citizens from the criminal element. Last year, more than 35 million Americans were victims of crime, almost 6 million of them were raped, robbed, beaten or murdered. Physical pain is not the only result of crime. Emotional pain and financial hardship disrupt the lives of the victims and place great strains upon their families. All too often our criminal justice system does not provide these victims with compassionate support and, may even add to their plight.

Three years ago, the President's Task Force on Victims of Crime presented an agenda to correct these injustices. Much progress is being made to help the victims adjust, but much more needs to be done. Through the continued efforts of State and local governments, private organizations and concerned citizens, the trauma suffered by the innocent victims of crime will be eased.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure and to join in activities which will further the cause of crime victims.

By Mr. QUAYLE (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SIMON, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. CHILES, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. KERRY, Mr. DODD, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S.J. Res. 298. Joint resolution to designate the week of October 5, 1986, through October 11, 1986, as "Mental Illness Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MENTAL ILLNESS AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, on behalf of a number of my colleagues and myself, I am introducing a joint resolution to authorize the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of October 5-11, 1986, "Mental Illness Awareness Week."

The purpose of this resolution is to focus public attention on concerns surrounding and advances in treating mental illness. Mental illness is a problem of grave concern and consequence in our society, though it is commonly and unnecessarily feared and misunderstood. Currently, 31 to 41 million Americans suffer from clearly diagnosable mental disorders involving significant disability with respect to employment, attendance at school, or independent living. As many as 12 million children suffer from mental illness, which impairs vital developmental and maturational processes. The elderly are also particularly vulnerable to mental illness. More than 10 million Americans are disabled for long periods of time by schizophrenia, manic depressive disorder, and major depression. It is estimated that between 30 and 50 percent of the homeless suffer serious, chronic forms of mental illness. Drug, alcohol, and mental disorders affect almost 19 percent of American adults in any 6-month period. Although mental-disorder deaths are estimated to be 33,000, with suicide accounting for at least 29,000, the real number is thought to be at least three times higher. All told, mental illness costs our Nation $106,200 million annually in health care expenses and lost productivity.

Regrettably, fear and misunderstanding of mental illness still pervade the Nation. Often the mentally ill are portrayed as being morally weak, and not suffering from a condition accepted as a disease. Those afflicted, because of the dual nature of their predicament, their illness, and their shame often do not seek help. Gradually, families of mentally ill citizens and those persons themselves have begun to join self-help groups seeking to combat the unfair stigma of the diseases, to support greater national investment in research, and to advocate for an adequate continium of care from hospital to community.

Mental illness is an increasingly curable disability with excellent prospects for amelioration and recovery when properly recognized and treated. Recovery from psychiatric problems is not only possible, but probable. About two-thirds of all mentally ill patients show significant signs of recovery with their initial treatment. Much of the progress in the treatment can be attributed to research in recent decades. This research has led to a wide array of new and more effective modalities of treatment—pharmacological, behavioral, psychosocial—for some of the most incapacitating forms of mental illness—including schizophrenia, major effective disorders, phobias, and panic disorders.

Mental health treatment provides a very effective cost-containment tool because treatment can result in reduced utilization of more costly medical hospital, medical and surgical services. A study by the National Institute of Mental Health found that utilization of medical and surgical services dropped anywhere from 5 to 85 percent following psychiatric care.

This joint resolution is inspired and dedicated to such groups as the American Psychiatric Association [APA] whose members conduct research for the treatment of mental illness and treat those suffering from the disease. Medical speciality societies like the APA, which itself represents 29,000 psychiatrists nationwide, stand at the center of efforts to bring mental illness under control. The APA and its membership believe that only through the understanding of the causes of mental illness and the knowledge of available treatment and successful cures will the fear and misunderstanding of this disease diminish with people then seeking timely and appropriate care.

Mental illness is an increasingly treatable disease; it is worthy of our attention and concern. I urge support and passage of this important resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 298 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 298

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas mental illness is a problem of grave concern and consequence in American Society, though one widely but unnecessarily feared and misunderstood;

Whereas 31 to 41 million Americans annually suffer from clearly diagnosable mental disorders involving significant disability with respect to employment, attendance at school, or independent living;

Whereas more than 10 million Americans are disabled for long periods of time by schizophrenia, manic depressive disorder and major depression;

Whereas between 30 and 50 percent of the homeless suffer serious, chronic forms of mental illness;

Whereas alcohol, drug, and mental disorders affect almost 19 percent of American adults in any six-month period;

Whereas mental illness in at least 12 million children interferes with vital development and maturational processes;

Whereas mental disorder-related deaths are estimated to be 33,000, with suicide accounting for at least 29,000, although the real number is thought to be at least 3 times higher;

Whereas our growing population of the elderly is particularly vulnerable to mental illness;

Whereas mental disorders result in staggering costs to society, totalling an estimated $106,200,000,000 in direct treatment and support and indirect costs to society, including lost productivity;

Whereas mental illness is increasingly a treatable disability with excellent prospects for amelioration and recovery when properly recognized;

Whereas families of mentally ill citizens and those persons themselves have begun to join self-help groups seeking to combat the unfair stigma of the diseases, to support greater national investment in research, and to advocate for an adequate continuim of care from hospital to community;

Whereas in recent years there have been unprecedented major research deveopments bringing new methods and technology to the sophisticated and objective study of the functioning of the brain and its linkages to both normal and abnormal behavior;

Whereas research in recent decades has led to a wide array of new and more effective modalities of treatment (both somatic and psychosocial) for some of the most incapacitating forms of mental illness (including schizophrenia, major affective disorders, phobias, and phobic disorders);

Whereas appropriate treatment of mental illness has been demonstrated to be cost-effective in terms of restored productivity, reduced utilization of other health services, and lessened social dependence; and

Whereas recent and unparalleled growth in scientific knowledge about mental illness has generated the current emergence of a new threshold of opportunity for future research advances and fruitful application to specific clinical problems; Now, therefore, be it;

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning on October 5, 1986, is designed as "Mental Illness Awareness Week," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator QUAYLE in the introduction of "National Mental Health Awareness Week." I want to commend Senator QUAYLE for introducing this commemorative resolution which focuses public attention on the incidence, causes, and treatment of the mentally ill. Designation of this week for the fourth consecutive year exemplifies this commitment to continue a partnership between States, local communities, the private sector, and the Federal Government to care for those who are least able to care for themselves—the mentally ill.

Last year, the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, which I chair, held a hearing on the "Barriers to Health Care for the Chronically Mentally Ill." The testimony presented at this hearing provided valuable insight into the needs of the chronically mentally ill.

For too long, many of the chronically mentally ill were inappropriately locked away in dismal institutions; forgotten, ignored, and mistreated. It has taken a long time for a more enlightened attitude to envolve within our national community. Today, we recognize that with appropriate care and support, many of our Nation's chronically mentally ill can be active, and they can be contributing members of society.

Historically, development of care for the chronically mentally ill has been dramatized by sharp contrasts. In the past two centuries, this kind of care has been provided primarily in large institutions. Yet our country has a long history of providing compassionate care at the local level. At the start of the 19th century, there was a movement to provide care for the chronically mentally ill in small centers organized around the family. At the turn of the century, the development of psychoanalysis led to the movement of providing care in small centers associated with universities. And finally, in the 1960's, the advent of modern psychiatric medications brought about a movement to deinstitutionalize the chronically mentally ill and to care for them in community health centers.

With each of these movements, there initially followed some impressive cure rates. Yet, in each case, time also brought with it overly centralized decisionmaking which slowed clinical progress. Finally, in 1981, Congress enacted the alcohol, drug abuse and mental health services block grant transferring outpatient services for the mentally ill to the States. This legislation, which I was pleased to sponsor gave priority to treatment for the chronically mentally ill. In addition, the bill cut out much of the Federal regulatory barbed wire which prevented community mental health centers from effectively treating the chronically mentally ill.

A GAO report in 1984 discovered that States were, in fact, becoming more able to treat more patients with chronic mental illness, further proving that States and localities are best able to identify and serve their own needs.

As illustration, I would cite my own home State of Utah, which is aggressively trying to provide support for the chronically mentally ill. With State, local, and Federal Government working together, Utah has been developing a statewide community mental health service delivery system available to 95 percent of those in need. The goal has been to provide appropriate care in the least restrictive environment, combined with the support of the family. This has enabled Utah to provide compassionate care for the chronically mentally ill.

The Federal Government does have a role to play in encouraging State, local community, and family efforts to help the chronically mentally ill. Thus far the Federal Government has centered around the continued search for methods to prevent and cure mental illness. Over the last 3 years, we have spent over one-half billion dollars for basic research on mental illness. From 1983 to 1985 there has been almost a 25-percent increase in this effort.

It is important to highlight efforts throughout the country concerning the partnerships developed in helping the mentally ill. Recognition of these efforts can be done daily, but a week-long commemoration helps us as a Nation to confront the problems of mental illness. I am proud to join Senator QUAYLE in this effort and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution entitled Mental Health Awareness Week.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 118—RELATING TO ACID RAIN LEGISLATION

Mr. DODD submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

S. CON. RES. 118

Whereas the deposition of acid compounds from the atmosphere is causing and contributing to widespread long-term ecosystem degradation in many parts of the United States;

Whereas the principal source of the acid compounds in the atmosphere is the combustion of fossil fuels;

Whereas current levels of emissions of air pollutants from existing sources as well as increased emissions from new sources threaten public health and welfare and the environment;

Whereas the long-range transport of sulfur dioxides and nitrogen oxides is a national and international problem and cannot be addressed adequately without Federal intervention;

Whereas reduction of the total atmospheric loading of pollutants such as sulfur dioxides and nitrogen oxides will mitigate the damage to affected ecosystems and enhance protection of public health and welfare and the environment;

Whereas more effective control of the interstate transport of air pollutants is needed in order to protect the health and welfare of the citizens of downwind States and the economic growth opportunities of downwind States;

Whereas control strategies and technology for precursors to acid deposition exist and are economically feasible;

Whereas both current and future generations of Americans will be adversely affected by delayed action and efforts to remedy the problem should commence now; and

Whereas the joint report of the special envoys on acid rain, commissioned by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, includes statements of findings which are widely supported by the international scientific and research community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That—

(1) the President of the United States should immediately endorse the findings of the special envoys that acid rain is a serious environmental problem in both the United States and Canada; and

(2) the Congress should enact comprehensive legislation which—

(A) expands the scale of research activities designed to develop new technologies for the reduction of acidic air emissions, and which reduces the costs, and improves the effectiveness of existing technologies; and

(B) achieves mandatory reductions in annual emissions of sulfur dioxides and nitrogen oxides through the establishment and enforcement of fixed emission reduction targets and timetables.

SENATE RESOLUTION 367—COMMENDING STEPHEN E. BELL FOR HIS SERVICE TO THE SENATE

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. CHILES, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. EXON, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HART, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SASSER, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. BINGAMAN): submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has ably and faithfully served the United States Senate since 1974;

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has executed his duties as the Staff Director of the Senate Budget Committee with the utmost in perseverance and personal dedication; and

Whereas Stephen E. Bell has earned the respect of his colleagues and this institution: Now, therefore, be it

SENATE RESOLUTION 368—RELATIVE TO FUNDING TO STATES FOR THE COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE

Mr. GORE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

S. RES. 368

Whereas the President has proposed reductions of $188,000,000 in Federal funding to States for Cooperative Extension Service programs for fiscal year 1987;

Whereas it is recognized that the agriculture must bear a part of the deficit reduction burden imposed by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985;

Whereas the proposed reduction of the President in Extension funding will adversely affect several agricultural activities, including national 4-H and youth programs (of which many projects are designed to promote the transfer of agricultural skills and techniques from one generation to the succeeding generation), home economics programs, natural resources programs, and community and rural development programs;

Whereas the President has proposed the elimination of several agriculture programs that would severely impact farm families throughout the United States, including the expanded food and nutrition program, urban gardening program, pest management program, farm safety program, pesticide impact program, financial management programs, and renewable resource programs;

Whereas farmers are the backbone of the economy of the United States and have already seriously suffered as a result of adverse economic conditions and misguided policies of the Federal Government;

Whereas extension programs are of enormous benefit to farmers, their families, and future farmers of the United States; and

Whereas a strong farm sector is of critical importance to the sustained economic performance of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Federal funding for Cooperative Extension Service Programs for the fiscal year 1987 should be restored to at least the level approved in the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986, except for reductions in such programs required by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985.

STAR WARS

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, it is generally acknowledged by reputable scientists that the President's star wars plan is a fantasy and a delusion which will not work in practice. The star wars system would depend on elaborate computer software and hardware, which could not be depended upon to work reliably if put to the test. For this reason, opposition to star wars is particularly strong among knowledgeable computer scientists who have studied the requirements of the star wars system.

Dr. Douglas Hofstadter, one of the most highly respected computer scientists in the United States, recently wrote an article in Newsweek magazine about the star wars fantasy. Dr. Hofstadter cogently lays out the reasons why star wars will not work, and why it is only a delusion in the minds of the President and his strategic planners. Dr. Hofstadter is the author of the Pulitzer prize-winning book, "Godel, Escher, Bach: An Eternal Golden Braid," and the recent best-selling book "Metamagical Themas". I ask that Dr. Hofstadter's recent column on star wars be reprinted in the RECORD, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

DREAMS OF A MAGICAL SHIELD

(By Douglas R. Hofstadter)

After World War I, France decided to erect an inviolable shield that would forestall invasion from its bellicose eastern neighbor, forevermore. This line of fortifications became known as the Maginot line, after War Minister André Maginot, who initiated its construction. Reinforced with thick concrete and underground rails, ultramodern in concept, Maginot's magical line was sadly outflanked when in 1940 Germany invaded France from Belgium. The Maginot line proved to be a bubble that popped.

I have two childhood memories that remind me of this magically inviolable shield. The first dates back to 1953, when schoolchildren were routinely told to "duck and cover" in case of enemy attack. I remember being terrified, when I went to bed, that Russian bombers were going to come and kill us all with atomic bombs. But I also knew that my father's work had something to do with atoms and atomic energy and that maybe it could save us all. I had often visited the Hansen Labs on the Stanford campus where my dad worked and I had seen the huge linear accelerator down which electrons were shot at nearly the speed of light. As an eight-year-old boy I was thrilled by thoughts of powerful particles whizzing down metallic tubes, scattering off of atomic nuclei, and I conceived of my own use for this accelerator: as a ray gun. I had probably heard that term somewhere but even if not, the idea of tilting this 300-foot monster on its end so it could fire into the air and knock down invading Russian bombers seemed perfectly logical to me one night as I trembled with fear in my bed. My father was out working, so I called my mother to ask her if my scheme would work, and I clearly remember her telling me that, yes, it would, it would indeed shield us all from the Russian bombers, and that I could go to sleep.

Waterborne fortress: I also remember my reactions some time later to an article I read in Science Digest; it described the world's largest warship, the aircraft carrier Forrestal. A waterborne fortress that sounded as if it could forestall any kind of invasion by anyone, the Forrestal, I thought, would provide an inviolable shield that no one could pierce, forevermore. When it finally was commissioned in October 1955, it wasn't hailed as the triumph I had expected, but by then, perhaps, I had caught on that no such magic moment was going to come.

Still, such hopes persist and often are reborn, even in the minds of adults. It appears that today we are collectively dreaming such a dream—about a much bigger Forrestal, a much bigger ray gun, namely President Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative, which is also known as Star Wars.

The dream quality of this defense strategy first hit me when I read about a TV commercial in support of SDI. The commercial shows a crayon drawing of a house, trees and a family of stick figures with a domed shield above them. Suddenly a wave of incoming missiles appears, but miraculously they bounce off the "bubble" and are destroyed. The shield then turns into a beautiful rainbow and the stick figures start to smile. A little girl's voice is heard saying, "I asked my daddy what this Star Wars stuff is all about. He said that right now we can't protect ourselves from nuclear weapons and that's why the President wants to build a peace shield. It would stop missiles in outer space so they couldn't hit our house. Then nobody could win a war . . . and if nobody could win a war, there's no reason to start one. My daddy's smart."

Talk about fairy tales! As a matter of fact, many of our best scientists believe SDI to be a complete delusion. There are so many fantastically unlikely things one must believe, that SDI seems about as silly as my childish dream of perfect protection. We cannot possibly know what the other side has devised in order to penetrate our invincible shield. We cannot know what devices will be sent, from where, how they will be disguised or how our own shield might be vulnerable. Our side, by the way, is already hard at work on ways to destroy and penetrate an enemy "peace shield," suggesting, perhaps, that our strategists don't believe their own claim that peace shields will be invulnerable. If the enemy's peace shield is penetrable, why should ours not be?

Technological spiral: Some scientists working on SDI are even more circumspect. A Defense Department panel of computer experts recently recommended a reversal in the Pentagon's pattern "to acquire the weapons first," since the complex software needed to make the system work is "the paramount strategic defense problem." The fact is that the SDI effort consists of an almost unimaginable tangle of mutually interdependent projects. Under circumstances that no one can come close to anticipating, all of them must work perfectly together, without any way to test them realistically—and the decision to risk the fate of the entire human race will have to be made in seconds by computers with no common sense whatsoever.

When one tallies up the "pro" versus the "con" voices in the scientific community, one finds that the skeptics include practically all the major scientific figures of our day. In articles both technical and popular, they have demonstrated that the arms race is a technological spiral without end and that Star Wars is a mythical quest—and worse, a dangerous delusion.

Such views should not surprise anyone willing to look at the immense number of unpredictables and intangibles in our world. Sadly, reality is not like a child's dream. And an updated version of Maginot's defense—"a Maginot bubble" floating above our country—is simply a line that a frightened public, yearning for magic, is willing to swallow whole.●

INDUCTION OF SANFORD GREENBERG AS A FELLOW OF BRANDEIS UNIVERSITY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, on February 26, 1986, in the Dirksen Senate Auditorium, a good friend of many of us, Sanford D. Greenberg, became a fellow of Brandeis University.

It was a distinct privilege to share in hosting this extraordinary celebration to honor Louis Brandeis and Sandy Greenberg. We were joined by cohosts Representatives JACK KEMP and STEPHEN SOLARZ in a formal academic ceremony at which Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., delivered an inspiring address on Justice Louis Brandeis' legacy to the country. We were also graced with the unique musical talent of Art Garfunkel of Simon and Garfunkel, accompanied by composer Jimmy Webb. The outstanding performance of "Bridge Over Troubled Water" and "Old Friends" was particularly moving because of the deep friendship between Mr. Greenberg and Mr. Garfunkel, who were college roommates.

Brandeis University President, Evelyn Handler, in formally hooding Sandy, noted that as a Brandeis fellow he joins a group of distinguished leaders ranging from scholars John Kenneth Galbraith and Oscar Handlin to leaders in public service, including Senator METZENBAUM and Representative SOLARZ, Ambassodor Maxwell Rabb, former Senator Abraham Ribicoff and Judge Simon Rifkind, entertainment executives Norman Lear and Samuel Goldwyn, and industrialists Harry Helmsley, Alfred Taubman, and Henry Crown.

Sandy Greenberg, who was born in Buffalo, NY, received his B.A. degree—Phi Beta Kappa—from Columbia College, his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in international relations from Harvard, and an M.B.A. degree from Columbia. A Woodrow Wilson fellow at Harvard and a Marshal scholar at Oxford University, Mr. Greenberg also attended Harvard Law School and taught international relations at both Harvard and Columbia. He is a director of the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations and a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

● Mr. METZENBAUM. As a member of the White House science advisory staff under President Johnson, he served on a Presidential task force to study the technology gap between Western Europe and the United States and participated in the development of Government policy on biomedical research and information systems. Harper & Row later published his book, "The Presidential Advisory System," which discusses the techniques used by American Presidents to obtain policy advice on managing the Federal Government.

Cited by Senator PAUL SIMON in a recent Chicago magazine article as, "perhaps this Nation's most successful inventor-entrepreneur," Sandy Greenberg's business interests range from telecommunications and electronics to entertainment, real estate, and health care. He is the founder and chairman of the Compressed Speech Co. created to develop the electronic device he invented and patented which "compresses" and expands recorded speech. He is also the founder and a principal stockholder of the Educational Computer Corp.—N.Y.S.E.—which manufactures general purpose system simulators, and in addition, has served as a director of the National Realty Committee and Tishman Realty & Construction Co., Inc.

Voted one of the "Ten Outstanding Young Men in America" by the U.S. Junior Chamber of Commerce in 1966, and "Man of the Year" in 1975 by the Young Presidents Organization, Sandy Greenberg was profiled in the book "Horatio Alger is Alive and Well and Living in America," by David Goodrich.

We believe that the accomplishments and contributions of people such as Louis Brandeis and Sandy Greenberg contain an inspiring message for all of us. It is, therefore, a privilege for us to insert into the RECORD excerpts of the remarks of Justice Brennan, Mr. Greenberg, and the other distinguished leaders who spoke at the induction ceremony.

The excerpts follow:

INDUCTION OF SANFORD GREENBERG AS A FELLOW OF BRANDEIS UNIVERSITY

REMARKS OF JUSTICE WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR.

It is a pleasure to participate with you in ths hooding ceremony and warmly to congratulate Sandy Greenberg upon his election for the honor of Fellow. Brandeis, a great University, is justly proud of its fealty to the inspiring ideals of Louis D. Brandeis—ideals that have so enriched our society and nation. And did you know that Louis Brandeis, too, like Sandy Greenberg, achieved greatness despite a serious eye ailment? The nation narrowly missed losing one of its greatest Justices when, after completing only his first year at the Harvard Law School, Louis Brandeis' eyes gave out, and his doctor advised him to abandon the law, his chosen career. He eventually led his class at graduation and legend has it that he achieved the highest grade average in the history of the school. But eye strain was his permanent companion throughout his brilliant career, as has too been so for Sandy.

Yes, for both Louis Brandeis and Sandy Greenberg, serious eye ailments were never allowed to be the slightest setback of extraordinarily distinguished careers. Although I never had the honor of meeting Louis Brandeis personally, I feel I know him well, because for now almost 30 years my chambers have been those assigned to Justice Brandeis when the Supreme Court Building was opened in 1935, and the desk in those chambers at which I wrote these remarks was also his.

What he accomplished was nothing less than to plant the constitutional seed from which much of the law protecting the rights of individual citizens was to grow. Patrician by birth, hugely successful as a corporation lawyer, why did he rush around the country arguing for laundry women and attacking institutions of power and wealth that many people were certain were America's greatest strength? It was what he saw all about him that stirred him first to anger and then to action. Hours were long, wages low, safety conditions appalling. He saw the poverty, experienced the stench, watched the bent bodies.

It was hardly surprising then that he made powerful enemies among the affluent establishment. For his was nothing less than a crusade against special interests and their exploitation of the poor and underprivileged.

The depth and intensity of the hatred of everything Louis Brandeis stood for surfaced quickly upon his nomination to the Supreme Court by President Wilson in January 1916. "Perhaps no nominee [to the Court], before or since, has been subjected to as searching an examination as he was, the target of such baseless charges and innuendoes."

It's probably true that some of the opposition reflects a degree of anti-Semitism, particularly since Justice Brandeis' unqualified devotion to and support of the Zionist cause was not always without controversy. But far more of the opposition was motivated by fear, indeed hate, of his ideas of what this America should mean for all citizens and not just for the privileged affluent. Those ideas had to do with providing freedom and equality of rights and opportunities, in a realistic and not formal sense, to all the people of this Nation: Justice, equal and practical, to the poor, to the members of minority groups, to the criminally accused to the displaced persons of the technological revolution, to alienated youth, to the urban masses, to the unrepresented consumers—to all, in short, who do not partake fully of the abundance of American life. Those ideas have not lost their force and desirability with the passing years. Who will deny that despite the great progress we have made in the decades since Justice Brandeis launched his crusade toward universal equality, freedom and prosperity, the goal is far from won and ugly inequities continue to mar the national promise. Much surely remains to be done.

Did his service on the Supreme Court reflect his commitment to his crusade? I expect we agree that that service justly earned Justice Brandeis his ranking as among the greatest of the 102 Justices who have served on the Court in our history.

Yes, because Louis D. Brandeis lived, ours is increasingly a society where the dignity and rights of every individual are equal before all authority. The outstanding careers of our honoree, Sandy Greenberg, in advanced scientific research and technology, business, government service, philanthropy and academia, is a measure of what one can accomplish when he won't let any setback, however formidable, defeat him.

REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN HEINZ

Thank you, Senator Metzenbaum.

We are truly here tonight to honor two extraordinary individuals. The first, of course, is Justice Brandeis, who is here in the person of his extended family . . . all of you. The second, of course, is Sandy Greenberg who is here accompanied by his real family, his wife Sue, his mother Sarah, by his daughter Kathryn, his two sons Jimmy and Paul, who are seated right down here in front. Sue and Sarah we are delighted that you are here for this special occasion. And Shirley and Theresa are keeping an eye out right behind you.

Justice Brandeis—a public man—is an authentic American hero. Through his oratory, his writings and the force of his personality, he truly reshaped America.

Sandy Greenberg, on the contrary, is a private man. But those of us who have known Sandy for many years believe he, too, is an American hero.

Howard, Jack, Steve and I have shared many a long dinner with Sandy, his fabulous wife Sue and their three lovely children, Paul, Jimmy and Kathryn. We have come to recognize Sandy's unique blend of talents, the breadth of his interests and experience, the strength of his character and courage. And fortunately, there is no known antidote to his infectious sense of humor. To say that Sandy is an educated man is an understatement. He has a doctorate in international economics from Harvard, a master's in business and finance from Columbia, has studied at Oxford and taught at all three. His business interests range from telecommunications and electronics to entertainment, from health care to real estate. He has served his country on the White House staff under President Johnson and his community through countless efforts, both public and private.

I think in honoring Sandy, Brandeis University is recognizing a man Justice Brandeis himself would have liked and respected. Like the Justice, Sandy combines a powerful, educated mind with a zest for action. Like Brandeis, he challenges the status quo intellectually and then acts to change it. And, like Brandeis, he has shown surpassing courage in accomplishing great things despite handicaps which would have beaten most of us.

When Brandeis University was being created after World War II, Albert Einstein cautioned, "Brandeis is a name that cannot be merely adopted; it must be achieved." There is no question in my mind that Sandy Greenberg has achieved the right to be a Brandeis Fellow.

REMARKS OF SENATOR HOWARD METZENBAUM

Thank you. It's a happy occasion. Happy for all of us and particularly happy for our friend, Sandy Greenberg. We're here to honor Sandy who is a good friend of mine, a successful businessman, a concerned human being. We also are here to celebrate a great University. Brandeis is unique among American institutions of higher learning. Founded in 1948 under the sponsorship of the American Jewish community, it was the first and remains the only Jewish-sponsored, non-sectarian institution of higher learning in America. In the beginning, there were only two buildings. Today, a mere 38 years after its founding, Brandeis has grown to include 90 buildings. But more important than all of the construction and the edifices, it boasts one of the finest faculties in the country. I think one can look at Brandeis and recognize that a measure of its success and achievement is the fact that within 13 years after it was founded it was accepted into Phi Beta Kappa. Admitted to Phi Beta Kappa, in the shortest period of any institution in the previous 100 years. We're all proud of Brandeis and, understandably, this is a special day both for the institution as well as our honoree.

REMARKS OF REPRESENTATIVE JACK KEMP

Thank you.

Of all the people in this room, I am probably the happiest that Sandy Greenberg decided to stay in Washington after he finished his White House service in 1967. If he had moved back to Buffalo, as some unwisely counselled, he might be standing in my place tonight while I was coaching the Buffalo Bills.

Everywhere Sandy Greenberg has gone, he has been a little larger than life. I've found it quite a challenge to seek to succeed in two worlds; Sandy moves effortlessly from academia to business to government to philanthropy. He is a patriot, a good family man, a dear friend, and I am proud of him.

I want very briefly to say, as Justice Brennan reminded us, how blessed this nation is that 70 years ago Justice Brandeis was confirmed by the U.S. Senate. How blessed we have been as a nation to have the great work of Brandeis University in our nation and in the world and how blessed we are by the friendship of Sandy Greenberg and his example. To be blessed by God puts an obligation on each and everyone of us to be a blessing to our neighbor. I think in the great tradition of the Jewish religion as well as Christian religion, it is obvious that to love our neighbor is an obligation.

Sandy, you are a manifestation of that love of neighbor and love of community, that so eloquently testified in the life of Justice Brandeis. I want to join your many friends, from the far left, to the center right, in telling you how proud we are of you and your accomplishments and how proud we are of that wonderful, dear Greenberg family.

Sandy, as your friend of more than two decades and on behalf of your beloved hometown, I offer my warmest congratulations on an honor well deserved. God bless you.

REMARKS OF SANFORD D. GREENBERG

Thank you, President Handler.

Louis Brandeis has been a hero of mine since childhood. It is, therefore, a special honor for me to become a Fellow of the great University that bears his name.

To all of you—to Brandeis University and its distinguished leaders; to these superb public servants Howard Metzenbaum, John Heinz, Jack Kemp and Stephen Solarz, whose dedication I respect and whose enduring friendships I treasure; to Art Garfunkel, as great a singer as you are, Arthur, you are even more precious and priceless as a friend; to my beloved wife Sue and to our wonderful children Paul, Jimmy and Kathryn; to my brother Joel and sisters Ruth and Brenda; to my dear mother Sarah, a woman of valor whose love, courage and determination have shaped our family—to all of you, I am profoundly grateful.

When I was growing up in Buffalo in the 1940s, Louis Brandeis was actually more than a hero. Here was an American Jew who had walked with Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and David Ben Gurion. For my friends and me, Louis Brandeis was our Horatio Alger.

In college, I learned more about Justice Brandeis. I admired his passion for economic justice, his defense of free speech, and his commitment to a Jewish homeland. Then, as many of you know, I lost most of my eyesight. As I struggled to cope with this disability, a dear friend who is here tonight, a fellow student—one of dozens who sat and read to me for hours on end—told me something about Justice Brandeis I had not known. As Justice Brennan has so eloquently and sensitively explained, Mr. Brandeis spent fifty years struggling to overcome his eye problem. Just as he was advised to give up the law, I was advised to return home to Buffalo to make screwdrivers in a sheltered workshop. For twenty-five years, I have kept a copy of the definitive Brandeis biography close at hand; his triumph has kept me going.

Over the past few months, Justice Brennan and I have spoken at length about Justice Brandeis. While I have been blessed with some remarkable teachers in my life, I have never had quite as extraordinary a tutorial as you have provided, Mr. Justice. I regret never having known Justice Brandeis. But if you will forgive the presumptuousness of one who this year enters the third decade of his official leave of absence from Harvard Law School, I believe Justice Brandeis is here tonight; he survives in the person, the intellect, the humanity and the courage of William J. Brennan.

No one accomplishes anything of significance in this world on his own. For me, as for Justice Brandeis, blindness serves to underscore this truth. I know I would not be standing here tonight but for my family and my friends. Above all, Sue, your love, your compassion, your patience and your strength have kept me in life and sustained me.

Without the love of other people, Justice Brandeis and I were condemned to live in dark worlds of our own. With their love—with your love—we share the light of hope and opportunity.

Thank you very much.●

TAX REFORM

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor a bill, S. 2108, introduced by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin. The bill states that the effective date of any tax reform package enacted by this Congress should be no earlier than January 1, 1987. I commend the distinguished Senator for pursuing this important issue.

On October 25, I, along with my good friends, Senators HAWKINS and DODD, introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 83, which stated that the effective date of any tax reform package should be no earlier than July 1, 1986. This resolution currently has 16 cosponsors.

Subsequently, the distinguished majority leader improved on my original proposal by calling for the effective date to be pushed forward by 6 more months to January 1, 1987. This resolution, Senate Resolution 447 passed by voice vote in December. I fully endorsed this effort. S. 2180 takes the idea one step further by creating binding legislation.

While I support the objective of tax reform, I believe it is imperative that no provisions of any tax reform package be retroactive. No one should be forced to enter a tax year with the uncertainty of retroactive tax reform hanging over their head.

After January 1, 1986, the current Federal Tax Code, in a sense, became irrelevant. Those individuals and corporations concerned with specific provisions of the Tax Code do not know whether to abide by current law or by proposed, but not yet enacted, tax reform legislation. Many economic transactions are being postponed until tax reform either is enacted or is laid aside. The issue of when tax reform will become effective already has created inefficiencies in the marketplace.

A good example of the disruption caused by the possibility of a retroactive effective date concerns the distortion occurring in the issuance of general obligation bonds. Many State and local governments that wanted to issue general obligation bonds after January 1, 1986, have been forced to postpone these issues. Even if a bond issue is completely appropriate under current law, the threat of changes in the Tax Code being enacted during 1986 with a retroactive effective date have squelched such deals.

Why? Because the House-passed tax plan would make many general obligation bonds taxable effective January 1, 1986. No investor will buy a tax-exempt bond that may become fully taxable on a later date.

The nonbinding resolutions, while they send a clear message, have failed to alleviate the concern. It is for this reason that I support S. 2108. Regards of what happens in the next several months with regard to tax reform, I believe the Congress must send a clear message to the business community that no tax reform legislation will become effective before January 1, 1987.

I urge my colleague to support passage of S. 2108.●

UNITED STATES AVIONICS SALE—WISHFUL THINKING ABOUT RED CHINA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it is bad enough when the news media sees nothing but progress and light coming out of Red China and endows Deng Xiaoping with god-like qualities of leadership and wisdom, but now the administration seems to accept the same distorted view. For years the center of such thinking was in the State Department, but much to my surprise and disappointment, I now find that certain people in the Department of Defense seem to share the odd notion that Communist China can do no wrong and is a threat to no one.

Believe it or not, there are some persons in a conservative Republican administration who argue that a Communist dictatorship on the mainland of China is a force of "peace and stability" in the region. They presume this dictatorship will always be in place and can be depended on to act in the interests of the United States as a counterweight to the Soviet Union, without endangering other peoples. These officials are so confident of the good faith and reliability of the Chinese Communist hierarchy and political system that they propose the United States Government should directly arm and modernize the military forces of a Marxist-Leninist regime founded on a one-party dictatorship, slave labor camps, arbitrary arrest and detention, and denial of every human liberty we hold sacred.

According to current U.S. planning, such a regime is worthy of receiving weapons systems and enhanced military capabilities from the United States, and what is more, we are asked to look forward to the growth of a long-term military relationship between our democratic Republic and an unproven Red bastion of free-world interests. This is not a policy. It is rolling dice.

FOUR MISSION AREAS

In a presentation made to the Heritage Foundation in January, an official in the Office of International Security Affairs at the DOD announced that four mission areas have been approved as the focal point of government-to-government sales of United States arms and military technology to mainland China. These include the areas of antitank, artillery, surface-ship, and antisubmarine warfare, and air defense.

The program began last September with formal notification to Congress of the sale of munitions and artillery plant equipment and technology amounting to $98 million. The next step is the planned sale of a $500 million avionics package to upgrade the indigenous F-8 jet fighter being developed by Red China.

Although the DOD and State Department contend that there will be no transfer of design or production technologies, the package does involve the integration of superior avionics components into the F-8 aircraft by a U.S. prime defense contractor. The package will include an airborne radar, navigation equipment, heads-up display targeting panels, a mission computer, an air data computer and a data bus. It will give the F-8 an all-weather capability now lacking.

WISHFUL THINKING

Mr. President, I am aware of the administration's arguments for the proposed sale and for the concept of developing a military relationship with Red China, and I strongly reject both notions. The position of those who would support the upgrading of mainland China's military capabilities, who would initiate a long-term military involvement between our two governments, and who would satisfy Peking's desire for a solid link between the United States aerospace industry and Communist Chinese military, is based on unsupported assumptions and not on fact or on anything but wishful thinking. This flawed mentality has guided United States' actions toward mainland China for too long. It is at the heart of what is wrong with American policies toward Peking and toward our old ally, the Republic of China on Taiwan.

Some American policymakers too easily persuade themselves to resolve every consideration in favor of deeper ties with Red China. Oblivious to the facts, these officials glibly assume that none of our friends in the Pacific Basin are concerned about the accelerated modernization of Communist China's military capabilities, that no harm is posed to the Republic of China on Taiwan, that Deng and his hand-picked successors will reign forever on the Chinese mainland, and, most incredibly of all, that in aiding the technological and weaponry development of a Communist military power, we can be assured she is and will remain a contribution to peace and stability in the area.

OUTDATED CONCEPT

A major flaw in the evolving military relationship with Red China is the total absence of any coherent, organized policy. The United States is embarking on a slippery slope and we do not know where it will take us. Whatever can be said about any single component of this process, our policymakers have not thought out the long-term consequences of the concept.

Our Government is acting on a piecemeal basis. What all these pieces mean after being assembled, and whether the concept behind our arms help is outdated, are unknown.

NOT A SOVIET COUNTERWEIGHT

For example, policymakers in the United States State and Defense Departments claim Red China can be made into a worthy counterweight for us against the Soviet Union. This ignores the insistence of Peking that it is not an "ally" of the United States and the argument is blind to the growing accommodation between the two Communist giants. The two countries have agreed to coordinate their planned economies and have signed a new trade agreement. Moreover, Premier Li Peng visited Moscow recently and assured Communist Party Secretary General Gorbachev that Peking "is not aligned with, nor does it establish strategic relations with other countries." So much for the supposed meshing of our strategic ends with those of Red China.

While I am doubtful of the strategic utility of upgrading Peking's military, I also find no comfort in the guidelines which supposedly will control these sales. Whatever performance parameters may be imposed, they will be ineffective so long as U.S. officials decide every hard question by assuming that everything will work out for the best. And whoever believed a Communist regime will keep its word?

DEFENSE OF TAIWAN

Proponents of the avionics sale assure us that an upgraded Red Chinese fighter will not at all threaten Taiwan's ability to defend its territory, including the Taiwan Straits. Our policy planners claim to know with complete certainty that the F-8 will not be stationed near Taiwan and will not hold any edge in performance over the F-5E now in the Republic of China inventory.

The fact that the F-5E does not possess an all weather and night capability, but the upgraded F-8 will, is glossed over, as is the fact that qualitative air superiority is essential to the defense of the Taiwan Straits. And, whether or not the F-8 is designed for "dogfight" maneuvers is irrelevant since most modern air combat is waged from great distances using missiles.

If the sale is so modest as not to reduce any technological edge held by the Republic of China, what purpose does it serve? The answer is given that it will enable Red China to protect its airspace against the Soviet Union, and thus keep Peking from being intimidated by the Soviets. The contradiction between the contention that the avionics sale is so minimal it raises no threat to Taiwan and yet is of such import as to give Red China better confidence to resist Soviet intimidation, is not even noticed. How one can have it both ways, I do not know.

The truth is that the avionics sale and other arms sales considered for Red China will have an insignificant effect on Soviet capabilities, but a major effect on Red China's position with respect to the Republic of China and other non-Communist nations in the Pacific Basin.

RED CHINA FEARED MORE

Arms sales proponents hear what they want to hear. When asked whether any non-Communist nation in the area has registered a serious concern about expanding the military capabilities of Communist China, we are informed that no nation has expressed "panic" about it. "Panic" and "concern" are different things.

According to reports I have received from Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, and other countries of the Far East, the truth is that Red China may be regarded as much or more of a threat in the region than the Soviet Union is. The question that needs to be answered is whether any of our non-Communist friends in the area have actually approved of our arms help to mainland China.

ARMS RACE IN THIRD WORLD

Surprisingly, one aspect of the United States-Communist China military relationship which has been ignored or overlooked by the advocates of this policy is the newly developed role of Peking as a leading world arms merchant. Mainland China is now the fifth largest exporter of arms in the world.

For example, Communist China has been all too eager to sell arms to African nations is the midst of their worst disasters and famines, when the money was needed for humanitarian ends. By selling Red China our weapons and technology at bargain rates, we are merely enhancing her capability to fuel the arms race by freeing her current inventory for sale in Third World and other impoverished nations.

UNCERTAIN PARTNER

Mr. President, my major objection to this particular arms sale and to the concept of a growing military relationship with Red China concerns its premise. The concept is founded on the notion that Red China supports peace and order in the far Pacific. Quite to the contrary, I see Red China as the oppressor of a billion Chinese people and as a Government with severe internal tensions and weaknesses and backwardness making her an unreliable and unpredictable partner for a military relationship. And where Red China is going to get the foreign currency and capital reserves to pay for these major defense purchases has not been explained.

The architects of this military relationship have failed to recognize that they cannot predict who or what elements will succeed Deng on the mainland, nor can we confidently predict the outcome of the economic reforms. Deng is not seen as the friend of the so-called People's Liberation Army. Like him, his heirs-apparent may not enjoy confortable relations with the PLA. The question should be asked, who will gain from American arms sales and technology transfers? Will it be a group of harmless economic reformers or exactly the opposite, a strong Communist military dictatorship?

How can the United States be confident that no new Marxist-Leninist experiment will collapse into disaster as the "cultural revolution" did? How can our policymakers be so sure that a modern revival of "war lordism" will not occur in any of the several military regions on the mainland? And, who can say that the takeover of Hong Kong will not become a bloody disaster fueling irrational elements in Peking and causing a change in the power structure?

In other words, Mr. President, I think there are too many people in this administration who look upon Red China with rosy glasses. There is too much unjustified confidence that her leaders and her policies will not change for the worse. Recent history proves otherwise.●

STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have recently called to the attention of my colleagues several articles from various sources concerning the deductibility of State and local taxes. Today, I would commend to my colleagues still another article on the subject. This article, written by Mr. James F. Scheiner, secretary of revenue for the State of Pennsylvania, appeared in the fall 1985 issue of Intergovernmental Perspective, published by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. As we are all aware, this Comission is made up of governmental officials from both parties and all levels of government—Federal, State, county, and municipal.

In this article, entitled "Federal Deductibility of State and Local Taxes: Fact and Fiction," Secretary Scheiner makes an important point. It is unfortunate that State and local officials have demonstrated a negative reaction to the proposal to trade deductibility for lower tax rates. Secretary Scheiner goes on to debunk seven fictions surrounding the Federal deductibility issue. These seven fictions, Mr. President, are:

(1) The President's tax plan will take away Federal deductibility, thereby increasing taxes for most Americans; (2) Federal deductibility is a tax break that predominantly benefits the middle class; (3) Federal deductibility prevents "double taxation" of income, and "double taxation" is inherently wrong; (4) State and local governments will have to sharply curtail services were Federal deductibility lost; (5) Federal deductibility of State and local taxes is no different from disaster relief or any other Federal program in that some localities get more from the program than others; (6) State and local governments are bearing the brunt of Federal tax reform, with the deductibility of State and local taxes representing 11% of total tax expenditures, but about 75% of base-broadening under the Treasury proposals; and (7) Federal deductibility of State and local taxes has been a principle of fiscal federalism, unchanged since the 1913 Federal Income Tax Code.

Mr. President, these "seven fictions" form the base upon which opponents of repeal have built their arguments. Secretary Scheiner explains clearly and precisely just why they are indeed fictions. He demonstrates how deductibility helps the rich, not the middle class, and repeal would help everyone. I must say that this article is one of the clearest rebuttals of deductibility I have seen to this date.

Mr. President, the article by Secretary Scheiner contributes greatly to the current debate over deductibility. I would urge my colleagues to strongly consider the points made by him as the Senate continues consideration of the tax reform issue.

Mr. President, I ask that the article referred to above appear in the RECORD at this time.

The article follows:

FEDERAL DEDUCTIBILITY OF STATE AND LOCAL TAXES: FACT AND FICTION

(By James I. Scheiner)

Many state and local governments have had a knee-jerk, negative reaction to the proposal to trade federal deductibility of state and local taxes for lower federal rates and higher personal deductions. This is unfortunate, because the trade-in of federal deductibility would benefit the vast majority of taxpayers. Why, then, have many state and local officials taken a position contrary to the interests of their constituents? To answer this question, we must examine and debunk seven fictions surrounding the federal deductibility issue.

Fiction: The President's tax plan will take away federal deductibility, thereby increasing taxes for most Americans.

Fact: The President's tax plan will trade federal deductibility for lower tax rates and almost double the personal exemptions, thereby decreasing taxes for most Americans.

No itemizing taxpayer wants to lose any deduction. When phrased in this way, the federal deductibility issue is bound to be unpopular. But this phrasing misstates the President's tax proposal. What is being proposed is a $36 billion trade-in, swapping federal deductibility for lower marginal rates and almost double the personal exemptions. This is a good trade-in for three reasons.

First, if most American taxpayers put pen to paper, they'd find out that they'd pay less federal tax after the trade-in. While we have not seen a definitive study that isolates the distributional impacts of just the state and local trade-in, we know that 60% of taxpayers who do not itemize certainly benefit, because they get no direct benefit from deductibility. Of the 40% who do itemize, many, if not most, would pay less tax with lower marginal rates and almost double the personal exemption.

Second, the goal of lower marginal rates is extremely important to sound tax administration. The root cause of the alarming increase in federal tax no-compliance is high marginal rates. Reducing marginal rates will reduce the attractiveness of all tax shelters and will encourage voluntary compliance. Pennsylvania provides a case study of tax compliance under low marginal rates. Pennsylvania has a low, flat-rate personal income tax, dropping back to a 2.2% rate on January 1, 1986. Almost 80% of the tax's $2.7 billion annual yield is collected through employer withholding. The state's Revenue Department runs as extensive series of computer cross-matches to search for personal income tax non-filers and under-remitters. These cross-matches show a remarkable degree of compliance among Pennsylvania's five million taxpayers.

Third, the goal of almost doubling the personal exemption is strongly pro-family. The President's proposal begins with a $2,000 personal exemption for 1986, then indexes this exemption for inflation. This feature, plus an increased earned income credit, would insure that any family below the poverty threshold would not pay a federal income tax. Under current law, a family of four begins to pay the federal tax at $9,575 of income; the President's proposal would increase this tax-free income level to $12,798.[1]

No doubt, Americans would prefer lower marginal rates, a higher personal deduction, and the preservation of state and local tax deductibility too. Of the three features, however, most Americans, including government officials, would admit that federal deductibility is the least important.

Fiction: Federal deductibility is a tax break that predominantly benefits the middle class.

Fact: The richest 20% of U.S. taxpayers get 83% of the money from deductibility.

According to The President's Tax Proposals, more than 30 million families, or 33% of the U.S. total, made some use of state and local deductibility in 1983.[2] Testimony by Virginia Governor Charles Robb before a U.S. Senate committee sets the percentage now itemizing deductions for state and local taxes at 41%.[3]

Clearly, millions of families use state and local deductibility. But who get the lion's share of benefits? An Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations' (ACIR) draft working paper, "Federal Income Tax Deductibility of State and Local Taxes," sheds light on this subject.[4] Information provided to supplement a table in the study shows that the richest 20% of American taxpayers pay two-thirds of the federal taxes, but get five-sixths of the tax savings from state and local deductibility (see Table 1). Almost half the benefits of state and local deductibility go to just 5% of taxpayers. That leaves only one dollar out of every six in tax savings for the remaining 80% of taxpayers.

Federal deductibility of state and local taxes is highly regressive. With a tax impact estimated at $36 billion in 1985, federal deductibility may be the most regressive single feature of the federal tax code on an absolute-dollar basis.[5] If Congress enacted a $36 billion income transfer program, transferring five-sixths of the dollars to the richest 20% of U.S. taxpayers, there would be a tremendous outcry about the program's inequity. Yet, that is precisely what the tax expenditure of federal deductibility accomplishes.

Fiction: Federal deductibility prevents "double taxation" of income, and "double taxation" is inherently wrong.

Fact: The majority of states tax income paid for federal and local taxes, resulting in the same "double taxation" that is opposed at the federal level.

While imposing a "tax on a tax" sounds as if it is inherently wrong, it is in fact an accepted practice of state, local and federal governments. For example, state and local governments would have to exempt federal escise taxes on cigarettes, liquor and motor fuels sales taxes to eliminate "taxes on taxes." In the personal income tax area, 28 states—including the populous states of California, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Ohio—apply a tax to personal income without deducting federal taxes paid (see Table 2). A state income tax deduction for local income taxes paid is more prevalent, with 22 states providing some type of deduction, although eight states (including California, New York, and Pennsylvania) do not. Why, then, must the federal government provide a deduction for state and local taxes paid particularly when many state governments do not reciprocate?

The majority of federal taxpayers do not itemize, and do not get any benefits from state and local tax deductiblity.[6] Attempting to preserve this deduction for a minority of taxpayers by using a double-taxation argument is clearly spurious, particularly from those government jurisdictions which impose their own double taxation.

Fiction: State and local governments will have to sharply curtail services were federal deductibility lost.

Fact: Most of the 30 state governments which are coupled to federally-defined income will raise more money at their same rates due to the base-broadening effect of the President's tax plan; most other state and local governments will face relatively minor adjustments under the President's tax plan.

State and local governments are understandably wary about federal tax reform. Federal taxes are tied in a variety of ways to state and local taxes.

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations is studying federal-state linkages, with deSeve Economics authoring "A Description of the Linkages Between the Federal and the States Personal Income Tax Codes" for ACIR.[7] Review of the April 1985 draft of this report indicates that the major problem facing many states under the President's tax plan will be how much to lower tax rates. Unless those states which are coupled to federally-defined income lower rates, they will be awash in extra tax money due to the base-broadening effects of the President's plan.

The predominant direct impact of the President's plan, therefore, is to generate substantially more money for many state governments, or provide them with an opportunity to lower tax rates. Beyond that, the fiscal effects on state and local governments are open to considerable conjecture. This is particularly true for federal deductibility of state and local taxes. The ACIR federal deductibility study has a section, appropriately entitled "Role of Fiscal Illusion," that discusses the tenuousness of taxpayer behavioral assumptions behind the fiscal impact analysis.[8] With acceptance of these tenuous assumptions, the study concludes:

"Our current best estimate is that eliminating tax deductions would mean that over the next five to ten years state and local governments would be pressed to cut spending, relative to what it would be otherwise, by about 2 to 3%. Because state and local spending has been growing by about 7% per year since 1980, the adjustment to the elimination of deductibility would come about through a reduction in the growth of state/local spending; elimination of tax deductibility would not cause an absolute drop in the level of state and local spending." [9]

Even this projection of a 2-3% lesser growth rate in state-local spending runs counter to empirical evidence. After the 1981 federal tax cut, the state-local tax deduction was worth less to the federal itemizer, but there is no evidence that this change has been a factor in any state or local government's spending since 1981. After the 1979 gasoline shortage, the Congress repealed federal deductibility of state gasoline taxes, amid cries that state legislatures would react by cutting taxes and, thereby, highway expenditures. In fact, the opposite occurred, with 44 states raising gasoline taxes subsequent to 1979, in response to the clear need for highway programs. In Pennsylvania, the loss of federal deductibility for gasoline taxes was never a factor—not even a miniscule factor—in gas tax debates.

Many state governments know that the President's tax plan will generate substantial new tax money at current rates, but this fact is a secret well-kept by public officials. Yet, the dubious proposition that loss of federal deductibility of state and local taxes will force a curtailment of government services has been trumpeted all across America by some of these same public officials.

Fiction: Federal deductibility of state and local taxes is no different from disaster relief or any other federal program in that some localities and states get more from the program than others.

Fact: Federal deductibility is fundamentally different from other federal programs. Each state and local government, by raising its own taxes, has the power to increase federal tax expenditures without any control exercised by the Congress.

Every time a state or local government raises its own taxes, taxpayers from the rest of America end up paying a greater share of the federal tax burden. This is the perverse result of federal deductibility, that links hundreds of thousands of state and local tax decisions to the federal system.

Some public officials have used "merit-want" arguments to justify this tax linkage. H. Louis Stettler, III, the Maryland budget secretary, is quoted as follows: "There is a big difference between providing food to needy children and the three martini lunch; between providing transportation to public schools and 'business trips' to the Superbowl."[10] The notion that governments can spend money "better" than private industry flies in the face of conventional wisdom about comparative efficiency.

In Pennsylvania, the Thornburgh Administration has achieved substantial savings in government operating costs while improving public services. For example, since 1978 the state Revenue Department reduced its payroll by almost 30%, while quadrupling collections of delinquent taxes and providing faster, more accurate customer service. The Pennsylvania Transportation Department has 2,500 fewer employees than it did seven years ago, yet highway repairs and construction activities are at historic highs. Despite staff increases for priority areas such as environmental protection and prisons, the Thornburgh Administration has trimmed the overall state payroll by 12,000—about 12%. Pennsylvania now ranks last among the 50 states in the ratio of state employees per 100,000 population. The Thornburgh Administration has achieved an average of $200 million per year in cost reduction savings through initiatives in such areas as state cars, printing, postage, and office and process automation.

With these successes, Pennsylvania could make a claim to be at or near "efficiency frontiers" in all its operations. Yet, the Thornburgh Administration continues to identify and achieve additional efficiencies. Many state and local governments join Pennsylvania in candidly acknowledging that there is room for greater efficiency in government. Given this environment, why should taxpayers in one jurisdiction, via the federal tax code, help subsidize state and local government spending elsewhere?

Fiction: State and local governments are bearing the brunt of federal tax reform, with deductibility of state and local taxes representing 11% of total tax expenditures, but about 75% of base-broadening under the Treasury proposals.

Fact: State and local governments do not directly pay any federal income taxes and they get a relatively small indirect benefit from state and local tax deductibility.

The U.S. Treasury Department estimates that, if state and local tax deductibility were eliminated, state and local governments would react by cutting back expenditures by about $6 billion.[11] But the price that is paid for this indirect assistance to state and local governments, which amounts to just 1½% of total state-local expenditures, is a $36 billion tax loss to the federal government. Given these figures, it would appear that the benefits of state and local tax deductibility to governments pale beside the benefits to America's richest taxpayers.

As a revenue sharing program, state and local tax deductibility is highly inefficient. Yet, many state and local officials defend deductibility on just this basis, arguing against its trade-in for lower tax rates and higher exemptions.

State and local officials from high-tax jurisdictions have been particularly vocal, raising fears that affluent taxpayers will flee from high-tax to low-tax areas, and that tax wars will be spawned. These fears are being exaggerated. Taxes are not the dominant factor in where people and businesses choose to locate. If they were, high-tax jurisdictions would not be participating as fully as they are in the nation's economic recovery. Further, state government itself can compensate for the differential impacts of trading in state and local tax deductibility on the various localities within that state. Regarding the specter of tax wars, if they mean increased competition to more efficiently deliver high quality state and local government services, most taxpayers would say: "Bring them on."

Fiction: Federal deductibility of state and local taxes has been a principle of fiscal federalism, unchanged since the 1913 federal income tax code.

Fact: The Congress has eliminated a number of state and local tax deductions, and after 72 years, remaining deductions need reevaluation on their merits.

In 1943, the Congress eliminated the deductions for certain state and local excise taxes. Then, in 1964, the deduction ended for state and local taxes on tobacco, alcohol, and vehicle registration and operators license fees. Since gasoline tax deductions ended in 1979, sales, income and property taxes are the only deductions left.

Thus, federal deductibility of state, and local taxes is not an all-or-nothing proposition. The Internal Revenue Service administers the sales tax deduction through an imprecise table that bears little relationship to taxpayers' sales tax expenditures. While, in theory, federal deductibiliy of sales taxes could benefit less affluent families, in fact these very same families do not itemize deductions and, therefore, do not get a penny from this federal exemption.

If compromise is necessary on this issue, federal deductibility of state and local personal income and property taxes could be phased out over time or could be limited to the rate of the lowest tax bracket, as in the Bradley-Gephardt proposal. Treating state and local taxes like catastrophic losses, by allowing deductions above some minimum, is particularly unattractive alternative. There is no rational basis for comparing state and local taxes to unexpected medical bills or casualty losses. Allowing deductions for only those taxpayers in the nation's highest tax jurisdictions creates and incentive for certain state and local governments to spend more and economize less.

Unlike certain other tax exemptions recently legislated by the Congress, federal deductibility of state and local taxes makes no pretense of promoting capital investment or economic growth. As a $36 billion tax expenditure, that redistributes 83% of the money to the richest 20% of U.S. taxpayers, state and local tax deductibility should be "on the table" for tax reform. State and local officials have a responsibility to provide the Congress with facts—not fictions—to support the deliberations on this subject.

COSPONSORSHIP OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 282

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor a resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 282, introduced by my distinguished colleague from New York. Senate Joint Resolution 282 states that the Congress should not approve the proposed fourth quarter rescission of general revenue sharing for fiscal year 1986.

When general revenue sharing was enacted in 1972, the Federal Government shared 2.5 percent of its revenues with State and local governments. Fourteen years later, the Federal Government shares just half a percent of its revenues with local governments.

General revenue sharing is crucial to the efforts of localities, both big and small, to provide vital services to their citizens. It is used to repair bridges, hire teachers, and plow snow, it feeds the elderly and employs police officers and firefighters. Some 335 Indian tribes, 3,000 counties, 16,000 towns and villages, 19,000 cities, and 220 million Americans depend upon general revenue sharing to keep our communities safe and strong.

At a time when local governments are in need of fiscal assistance to provide many essential services, long since cut by Federal budget cuts, the Federal Government is looking to cut more. I believe it is time to protect the interest of the local governments.

I urge the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 282.●

MICHAEL A. VENTRESCA SCHOLARSHIP FUND

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, today I rise with both sadness and pride to honor the memory of my friend Michael Ventresca. It is with sadness that I tell my colleagues of the loss of a warm, caring, committed human being. Yet it is with pride that I note the establishment of the Michael A. Ventresca Scholarship Fund.

Michael was taken from us on December 29, 1985, the victim of a senseless accident. At the time of his death, he was only 38. In that short time, he accomplished much and left a living legacy of young people whom he had ushered into public service. It is my hope that the scholarship in his name will continue the tradition of public service in his memory.

Michael cmbodied the well known Massachusetts zeal for government and politics. He was an idealist whose political conscience was forged in the cauldron of 1960's activism. He was a graduate of the University of Massachusetts-Boston, where he demonstrated his early leadership qualities as president of the Class of 1969. He was a graduate of Suffolk University Law School, where he was editor of the Suffolk Law Review. It was during this time that he first showed what would become a lasting commitment to values such as peace, justice, equality, compassion, and fairness. Michael spoke out for these values as he opposed the war in Vietnam, marched in the civil rights movement, sought to preserve our environment and led the effort to stop the death penalty in Massachusetts.

As the times and values changed, Michael stood true to his beliefs. Through his idealism and activism, he kept alive the progressive causes he originally championed. He knew when it was time to stand his ground on principle. And he was willing to lose on principle. He lost twice on ballot initiatives, He took them on knowing they would be uphill fights. To Michael, principles mattered more than odds.

Michael was at his best in political campaigns. He loved them and his enthusiasm was contagious. His enthusiasm was particularly quick to spread among young people. He had a special ability to motivate and inspire. Over the years, literally thousands of young people came under his charge and his spell. Michael seemed to take an interest in everybody no matter how great or small, significant or insignificant the person was. And he always made time for each one. His ear was always available to the many young campaign workers or protegees who sought advice, solace or help.

Michael was a kind, generous, and selfless person. For a man who fought so many battles, he achieved a rare distinction: he left no enemies. Perhaps that can best be attributed to his integrity.

Michael's integrity earned him the trust of friend and foe alike. As a lobbyist, he was a skilled and effective negotiator with an uncanny ability to bring people together. People trusted Michael to help them reach a compromise that would be fair to both sides.

His successes as a negotiator were many, but he never bragged of winning. He took his satisfaction from bringing opposing sides together and building a consensus. He was always positive, optimistic, conciliatory. He was never negative, pessimistic cr divisive. Michael had a knack for bringing out the best in people. He encouraged, prodded, and cajoled countless young people into reaching their full potential. He was mentor, example, and role model to the many young people he introduced to public service.

The creation of this scholarship ensures that Michael's values, idealism, and activism will be perpetuated. Through this scholarship, young people interested in public service will receive a college education that will help them prepare for a career in the field to which Michael brought so many recruits. Plans call for the creation of a permanent, 4-year scholarship at Michael's alma mater, the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

On March 24, Michael's friends will gather in Boston to remember him and to contribute to the Michael A. Ventresca Scholarship Fund. At this time, I would like to read the list of public officials who have joined me in serving as honorary chairmen of this event: Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR., Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives; Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, U.S. Senator; Hon. CHESTER ATKINS, Member of Congress; Hon. BARNEY FRANK, Member of Congress; Hon. JOSEPH MOAKLEY, Member of Congress; Hon. GERRY E. STUDDS, Member of Congress; His Excellence Michael S. Dukakis, Governor, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Hon. Michael J. Connolly, secretary of state, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Hon. Francis X. Bellotti, attorney general, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Hon. William M. Bulger, president, Massachusetts Senate; Hon. Robert Q. Crane, treasurer, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Hon. John J. Finnegan, auditor, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Hon. Raymond L. Flynn, mayor, city of Boston; Hon. George Keverian, speaker, Massachusetts House of Representatives.

These names are a tribute to Michael. They speak of the gratitude and respect he earned through a career dedicated to public service and to the belief that government can do good things and improve people's lives.

But to focus on these names would miss the point. When Michael's friends gather in Boston on March 24, the purpose will be to continue a tradition of bringing young, unknown names into public service. Michael's friends will be helping to create a scholarship that will assist, educate and encourage young people, just as he did.

It is appropriate that this event will take place at the John F. Kennedy Library. It was President Kennedy who said, "One man can make a difference, every man must try." Michael Ventresca made a difference. With the creation of this scholarship, others will be given the chance to try.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE FOR SOVIET JEWRY

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I commend my colleague from Maine, Senator MITCHELL, for leading the effort to aid those suffering from religious persecution. I am proud to be a part of this protest against oppression of individuals in the Soviet Union. It is my belief that efforts such as the Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry, contributed to the gratifying release of Anatoly Shcharansky. Therefore, as 1986 continues, we must renew our determination to gain freedom for the many remaining refuseniks.

I am honored to be involved, once again, in the 1986 Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry. Many of my colleagues are involved in this bipartisan struggle to gain awareness and recognition for those currently suffering in the Soviet Union. I, myself, have adopted Leonid and Ludmila Volvosky in support of their efforts to emigrate to Israel. The Student Coalition For Soviet Jewry, which arranged my adoption of the Volvosky family, reports that Leonid has been harassed and detained by Soviet officials several times, as a result of his desire to emigrate to Israel. Leonid was arrested again last June and all attempts of his family and friends to gain his release have been denied by Soviet officials. Hopefully, the Call to Conscience will focus attention on the plight of Soviet Jews, like the Volvosky family.

Patrick Henry wrote that "All men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience." The denial of one of the most basic human rights, freedom of religion, is an appalling tenet of Soviet dogma. Currently, Soviet officials are planning to bulldoze one of the Soviet Union's few remaining synagogues, the Ashkenazi Synagogue in Tbilisi. The closing of the synagogue will tragically affect the 20,000 Jews in the community, already under siege. Countless letters, speeches, and prayers have been offered in behalf of those persecuted in the Soviet Union. These people yearn for the freedom to practice religion as they please, the right to privacy and the right to emigrate—rights guaranteed to the people of the Soviet Union with the signing of the Helsinki accords of 1975.

The refusenik community consists not only of Jews, but of individuals from many other religious communities that wish to be free. The United States has long attempted to defend the dignity of all individuals in the Soviet Union. Recent events indicate an improvement in the working relationship of our Government and the Soviet Union. Media coverage of the recent Geneva summit forced Gorbachev to deal openly with tough questions from the world media regarding the plight of Soviet Jews. A likely exchange of State visits between our national leaders could also force Gorbachev into the realization that his country can no longer deny religious freedom to the refusenik community and hope to pursue peaceful negotiations with the United States. There is certainly reason to hope, given the Soviet's recent courtship of Western media and their interest in reaching out to American businessmen for expanded trade between their nation and ours. The release of Anatoly Shcharansky provides more evidence that negotiations between our governments can be effective.

The refuseniks must know that the United States will continue to fight for their cause. Ours may be the only voice of freedom that they hear. It is vital for us, as citizens of a free nation, to offer support and assistance to the people of the Eastern bloc countries. The fight for the dignity of all people must never be forgotten. May the Congressional Call to Conscience be but one facet of our Nation's effort to keep the torch of freedom burning brightly in the hearts of those persecuted in the Soviet Union.●

COSPONSORSHIP OF A RESOLUTION AFFECTING STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS ABILITY TO RAISE REVENUE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of a resolution introduced by my friend from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, to put the Senate on record that major tax reform should not inhibit State and local government's ability to finance their infrastructure.

I commend my colleague for drafting this resolution to protect essential services provided by State and local governments. Financing for State and local governments is essential to ensure proper health and safety services, as well as basic support systems on which all economic activity depends.

It is wrong to hamper local governments through the inclusion of provisions in tax reform which will discourage investors from purchasing tax-exempt bonds; which will make it difficult to obtain tax-exempt financing by placing certain projects under limited volume caps; which will impose retroactive effective dates; or which will prevent local governments from using legitimate cash-management techniques.

In the end, it is the individual who suffers from the lack of proper facilities, and it is the individual who suffers from increased State and local taxes needed to finance these outmoded or unsafe facilities.

I believe it is necessary, therefore, for members of the Senate interested in protecting the infrastructure of State and local governments, as well as the individual constituent, to join together and send a message to those responsible for producing a tax reform bill: True reform does not deny local governments the ability to finance their activities properly.

I urge my colleagues to support and pass this resolution.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: AN INTERNATIONAL APPEAL FOR MEDICAL TREATMENT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Naum and Inna Meiman, two personal friends of mine, are caught in a political decision that threatens Inna's life. Naum and Inna are refuseniks—Soviet Jews who have applied to leave the Soviet Union. Since making their application, the Meimans have endured harassment and, in Naum's case, denial of employment in his field. Now, Inna is cancer-ridden and desperately needs medical treatment only available to her in the West.

The following letter appeared in the February issue of Physics Today. I ask that the text be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

REFUSENIK PHYSICISTS

I have recently received two open letters from Soviet "refusenik" physicists with the request that I share them with your readers. I present only excerpts. The first is from Naum Meiman and addressed to Mikhail S. Gorbachev, Secretary of the Communist Party, and the second one is from Armen G. Khachaturyan and addressed to A. Aleksandrov, president of Soviet Academy of Sciences. Both of these scientists believe that appeals from Western colleagues can help them greatly in their present situations. This is also the belief of other refusenik scientists and dissidents and I feel that in cases like these we have to take the wishes of the oppressed as our guide for action.

Meiman writes: A few words about myself: I am a professor of mathematics, 74 years old. Since 1975 I have been seeking permission to go to Israel. My only daughter left the Soviet Union in 1976. I am refused permission to go, on the pretext that I had done classified work. More than 30 years ago, at the dawn of the atomic age, before there were even any computers in the Soviet Union, I did certain classified calculations for long-dead Academician Landau in the Institute of Physical Problems of the Academy of Sciences. These calculations were a very auxiliary nature, and have long ago lost all sensitivity and significance. I transferred to work in another institute in 1955, and as officially certified, never had any further contact with sensitive work. When I applied to go to Israel in 1975, I was compelled to retire on pension.

Two years ago, a tumor appeared on the back of my wife's neck, close to the spinal column. This could be treated only with extremely sophisticated modern equipment and skill in using it. The Soviet Union still has neither the equipment nor the skill to use it. The only thing Soviet medicine could offer was surgery. Now for two years, my wife has had four risky, painful operations, the last one in the Oncological Center three months ago. So much muscle tissue has by now been removed that no further operation is feasible. My wife holds her head up with difficulty, and is in constant pain.

Immediately after the disastrous first operation, in October 1983, my wife received generous invitations to the treatment in oncological clinics in Sweden, France, the United States and Israel.

This inspired my wife and me to go to the national emigration chief, Colonel Kuznetsov, on 4 September and apply to him personally to let my wife go with her mother, brother, son and two grandchildren, leaving me behind. A week later, Colonel Kuznetsov informed me by phone that this was refused. On 18 September he told my wife that she could not leave with other members of her family because she had been married to me to long and her departure would constitute a security risk for the Soviet Union.

This malicious, paranoid nonsense is more than a fatal threat to my wife; it is in fact a danger for the whole world, even for the Soviet Union itself. It is absurd and dishonest in the extreme to claim that my departure would threaten the safety of the USSR. To claim that my sick wife's departure would be risky is simply dangerous madness. My wife worked only as an English teacher and we married in 1981, a full 26 years after I ceased all contact with classified work. It arouses a dangerous pyschological climate of mutual distrust, preventing achievement of vitally important compromises."

Mr. President, I strongly urge the Soviet Government to allow Inna and Naum Meiman permission to emigrate.●

PROMOTING DEMOCRACY ABROAD: IN OUR BEST INTEREST

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, as we approach the upcoming floor debate over granting military aid to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, we are forced to reconsider what should guide our foreign policy—our own democratic principles or some other principles that may seem more expedient in a given situation. Last Saturday, in an extraordinary speech by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee before the National Federation of Young Republicans, the answer given and supported with the strongest and soundest of reasoning was our democratic principles.

As the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana made clear in defense of the President's policies both in the Philippines and Central America:

Supporting democracy may sound simplistic * * *. But it gives the ability to call election fraud for what it is, to call dictatorships for what they are, and to call authoritarian regimes for what they are.

Mr. President, I believe Members of both Houses could greatly profit from reading this speech, and I ask that its full text be entered at an appropriate place in the RECORD.

The text follows:

DEMOCRACY AND AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY: A COROLLARY TO THE REAGAN DOCTRINE

(By Senator Richard G. Lugar)

Democracy is the strongest suit of American foreign policy. Promoting and protecting democracy is in the best interests of the United States. Democratic countries celebrate human rights, they enhance our security interests, and they are good trading partners.

Democracy is not easy. Too often in the past, the United States has naively called for democracy in developing and third world countries only to see elections fail. We have tried to prop up so-called democratic "white knights" only to see them turn into petty despots.

Democracy requires the development of institutions in a society that work against the consolidation of power, and open up a society to free political discourse. Political parties, labor unions, business associations, churches, a free press and citizens groups concerned about the sanctity of the ballot are all required.

American foreign policy should work to develop these democratic institutions in the world. We must defend and promote the process of democracy. That is what we did in the Philippines, and that is what we need to do in to encourage reform in Nicaragua, Angola, Chile, and South Africa. Each country is different and the politics of each have to be taken into account. But the goal of American foreign policy should be constant, and that is, democracy. Once we reach a consensus on that goal—as I believe we are doing in the United States—we can go about implementing that goal within the cultural and geopolitical circumstances of each country.

The Philippine experience shows the importance of the election process. Thousands of volunteer poll watchers risked their lives to defend the right to vote and to have a fair count in the Philippines. They set democratic participation and performance standards by which that election could be judged both by Filipinos and by the world. Ferdinand Marcos lost the election. When he tried to claim a fraudulent victory, he lost his legitimacy to rule.

The Philippine experience is instructive to the course of American foreign policy. My involvement in the Philippine election began in Central America. I was in Guatemala observing elections there on November 3, 1985, when Marcos announced "snap elections" on American television. The conventional wisdom of many in Washington was that the Guatemalan elections wouldn't lead that troubled country to much democracy. Various columnists and commentators observed that the military would still be in control regardless of who won. Much the same argument was later made in the Philippines: Marcos would win by hook or by crook, or call the whole thing off. But in Guatemala, and then in the Philippines, the worldly conventional wisdom was wrong.

There is a passion for democracy in the world. In Guatemala, I witnessed mountain Indians travel many miles to vote. No one made them. This was their privilege and nothing was going to stop them. Guatemala now has a democratically elected government. General Majia did step aside, and Guatemala is on the difficult road to economic recovery.

The situation was more complex in the Philippines. The generals in Guatemala asked for our help in setting up the election. We helped establish certain election procedures: transparent ballot boxes, identification ink, computerized registration rolls, watermarked ballot paper, and the tabulation process. It was not as easy in the Philippines. Marcos invited American election observers. He did so with bravado, suggesting that since no one would believe how big his mandate would be, he wanted all of us there just to see. Given the history of voter fraud and violence in the Philippines, I was reluctant to commit the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to observe the elections.

Nevertheless, I did not want to flatly reject Marco's call for American election observers. The Committee had already gone on record calling for economic and military reform in the Philippines. Without that reform, we believed the communist insurgency would grow. I contended that the best course for American election observers in the Philippines was to ally ourselves with the reform movement. The National Movement for Free Elections, or Namfrel, was such a movement. They were committed to a free and fair election. They were priests, nuns, students, housewives, Kiwanis and Rotary Club members, and in some places members of Republicans Abroad. Staff members of the Foreign Relations Committee had worked with Namfrel in the 1984 parliamentary elections in the Philippines, and in fact had begun preliminary discussions with them about the planned May 1986 municipal elections.

The Foreign Relations Committee held three hearings on the Philippines before the election. We sent a delegation of American election law experts—top lawyers for the Republican and Democratic Parties who sometimes see each other in court contesting Federal Election Law rules—to review the Philippine election procedures. A second group followed up on their report. These election law experts established a checklist for the Committee on what should be done to make the election as free and fair as possible. We questioned the will of the Marcos government to live up to these procedures, but were heartened by the excitement and the passion of the Philippine people for the election. Many members of Congress and the press dismissed the election as a fraud even before it happened. Some of these individuals are now quick to embarce the election success, however. The Philippine people were enthusiastic about their chance to make a democratic choice from the start.

Despite my concerns about fraud, I decided that the United States could not abandon these people who wanted to exercise their right to vote. The review of election procedures and the suggestions we made and Marcos followed, gave us a way to judge the election, For example, before I went to the Philippines, I told Marcos' acting foreign minister that a long delay in the quick count between Namfrel and the Commission on Elections would spell trouble with a capital "T" because it would show that someone was cooking the results. As it turned out, that's exactly what happened. Everybody knew what it meant, and Marcos lost his legitimacy.

The United States was able to help the Philippine people transfer power in a peaceful way because we had positioned ourselves as defenders of the democratic process and not as backers of one of the candidates.

When I visited polling and canvassing areas throughout the Philippines, I was swamped by people excited to have us there. They did not know much about me, but they knew I was an American observer committed to supporting the democratic process. The American press had the same experience. Filipinos didn't want us to leave. The American people, as it turned out, also wanted us to stay and speak out. The intense coverage of the election on American television and in the press had a strong impact on the American people. Upon my return to the United States from the Philippines, I went directly to Indiana after visiting with President Reagan. wherever I went in Indiana, at high schools, chambers of commerce, factories, and Republican Lincoln Day Dinners, there was execitement about the Philippine elections. In the heartland of American there was a strong commitment to promoting democracy abroad, and a strong feeling that our country had been successful in doing precisely that.

American policy succeeded in the Philippines because American policy supported democracy. The American people, more importantly than any policy, also supported democracy. When they saw democracy being stolen, President Reagan responded by advising Marcos that his claim of election victory lacked credibility. Marcos then left.

Now there is much discussion in Washington about whether the Philippine experience can be transfered to other parts of the world. The cultures and histories of each country are different and should affect our policies accordingly. But in a very simple yet powerful way, the Philippine experience points the way to new American foreign policy based on free and fair democratic elections. This is a corallary in some respects to both the Kirkpatrick and the Reagan Doctrines.

The Kirkpatrick Doctrine argues that there is a difference between authoritarian regimes led by anti-communist dictators and totalitarian regimes led by communist dictators. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick argues that the United States should be tough on the communist dictators, and help the authoritarian rulers evolve toward democracy as we did in Guatemala. The Reagan Doctrine argues that the United States should actively back freedom fighters struggling against communist totalitarian regimes. The corallary to these two doctrines is that the United States should be busy promoting democracy in all of these dictatorships. I believe that there should be free and fair elections not only in the Philippines, but also in Chile, Angola, and Nicaragua.

Now there are some skeptics who argue that it's absurd to push for elections in communist dictatorships. "Everybody knows that Marxists don't hold free and fair elections," they snort. But why should we accept such constraints. It's apparent that people in Nicaragua and in Angola want democracy, that they want elections, and that they are fighting for their very lives to obtain them. They deserve not only our comfort, but also our aid.

Actively supporting democracy offers a consistency and an element of consensus that our foreign policy has lacked since Vietnam. Ronald Reagan has led this country past the Vietnam syndrome. We have a President who is not afraid to act, and an American people proud of our role in the world. However, we are still debating how we can both be effective and true to our beliefs as we deal with the many crises of the world.

One of my distinguished predecessors as Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, J. William Fulbright, criticized the foreign policy that led this nation into the Vietnam War. He called it the Arrogance of Power. But after the fall of Vietnam, our foreign policy became the Abdication of Power. It was a policy full of moral outrage, but no action. The United States withdrew from the world. There are still many who follow this neo-isolationist policy.

This policy in fact is the cause of many of our problems in Nicaragua. President Carter stopped supporting the dictatorship of Somoza, but refused to actively assist and boost the moderate and pro-democratic forces who looked to the United States for help. The middle collapsed and the Marxist Sandinistas took over. Now we must find a way to rebuild that democratic alternative.

In South Africa, the neo-isolationists espouse a policy of moral outrage and disinvestment. It's a policy of cut and run. Instead, President Reagan with the support of Congress has constructed a policy that expresses our outrage of apartheid, but tries to use American influence to support democratic and nonracist alternatives.

So what should we do about Nicaragua? The Philippine experience points the way to a policy that supports the development of a democratic alternative and elections. If we can reach a consensus that this is our policy goal, then we should implement it in a determined, responsible, and patient way.

There is strong opposition to the Sandinistas. In recent months the Sandinistas have stepped up their campaign against human and political rights. Churches, labor unions, business groups and the press are all under attack. Nicaraguan Indians have been the victims of a campaign of genocide.

A group of the Contra leaders have formed the Unified Nicaraguan Opposition. They call for an end to human rights abuses, a return to democratic freedoms and elections. The United States should support UNO, and help it become responsible democratic front organization. Meanwhile, we should increase diplomatic pressure on the Sandinistas in conjunction with the other countries in the region. We need to pressure the Sandinistas both internally and externally to change their ways.

Predicting that diplomatic pressure alone will change the Sandinistas is a non-starter. The Sandinistas will drag their feet forever while they try to destroy the last vestiges of freedom in Nicaragua. Putting United States aid into an escrow account would delay meaningful negotiations.

What the United States should say to the Sandinistas is that we will give military aid to UNO until and unless the Sandinistas agree to implement a series of reforms. The United States can announce these at a Contadora meeting in May, or sooner for that matter.

These reforms should be:

1. Removal of Cuban and Soviet military advisors, and a pledge that they will not return.

2. Reductions of military forces.

3. An end to support of the El Salvadoran rebels and any other insurgencies.

4. A cease fire with the Contras.

5. Free and fair elections to a Nicaraguan constituent assembly to be monitored by a free press and regional observers, with free access for all candidates to all voters in all parts of the country.

If the Sandinistas implement these reforms, the United States would stop military aid shipments to UNO.

The President's request now before Congress gives him the discretion to implement this policy. Adding all kinds of strings and certifications will only hinder the effectiveness of the United States to act.

The President faces a tough vote in Congress. Regardless of the outcome, Nicaragua will not go away. The Sandinistas have no sympathy in Congress. There is a consensus on the Foreign Relations Committee to back UNO. I will continue to visit with my Committee and other Members of Congress, and with the President and Secretary of State to maintain a consensus approach as we work through the process of supporting a democratic alternative in Nicaragua. The policies I have outlined here point in the right direction.

Ronald Reagan has given this country new hope for the future. It is "Morning Again in America," but the problems we face around the world make our lives more like "High Noon." We have to face them with realism, but with our inherent American sense of idealism. Supporting democracy may sound simplistic. Emphasizing it may sound square and unsophisticated. But it gives us the ability to call election fraud for what it is, to call dictatorships for what they are, and to call authoritarian regimes for what they are. There is much to say for and to praise about the simple honesty of democracy, and that's what the United States should be doing in the world today.●

HONORING ST. PATRICK WITH A RENEWED COMMITMENT TO PEACE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, although the St. Patrick's Day celebration is a truly Irish one, its appeal extends to Americans of all backgrounds who delight in discovering that, each year on March 17 they, too, are "just a little bit Irish."

Americans of Irish descent have played a critically important role in the growth of our own Nation. Of those who signed the Declaration of Independence, nine were of Irish descent and thousands more supported that declaration by fighting for its defense. I addition, the rich Irish heritage in music and literature continues to bring enjoyment to all Americans.

As we join with the Irish-American community in the festivities to mark St. Patrick's day, we also join with them in their concern over the political turmoil which, after 17 years and 2,500 fatalities continues to tear their homeland apart.

In honoring the man who shared the Christian Gospel with the people of Ireland, we renew our calls for an end to injustice and oppression and for peace and unity in Ireland.

The signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement in November of last year represents the most recent effort to bring about an end to the unrest and discrimination in Northern Ireland. With this accord, the Republic of Ireland is given, for the first time, a voice in the affairs of Northern Ireland. Protection of the civil liberties and security of the Roman Catholic minority in Northern Ireland is another important aspect of the agreement.

As a member of the "Friends of Ireland" bipartisan congressional coalition, I endorse the call for the peaceful achievement of Irish unity, and encourage strong United States support to help ensure the survival of this important peace initiative.

Mr. President, I believe that the greatest tribute that could be paid to St. Patrick would be the ending of hostilities in the land which received his Christian teachings. On this St. Patrick's Day I encourage all parties to support current reconciliation efforts in a sincere effort to bring to life a just and lasting peace in Northern Ireland.●

BERKLEY BEDELL

● Mr. SIMMS. Mr. President, I note that our House colleague, Congressman BERKLEY BEDELL, will be retiring.

I was first elected to public office when I was 25—elected to the State legislature in Illinois. I am now 57, and in those 32 years, I do not know how many public officials I have worked with and dealt with.

Most of them are fine people.

But I can count on the fingers of one hand those who have really been outstanding, and one of those has been BERKLEY BEDELL.

He is not outstanding in the sense that you read about him each day in the newspapers or you point to massive changes in the law that have come about through his leadership.

But he is outstanding in being conscientious and sensitive, having compassion and common sense. He also has some vision of where this country must go.

His decency, his being a true gentleman in the finest sense of that word are qualities that have endeared him to his colleagues in the House and the Senate.

The people of his district in Iowa will suffer a severe loss, and all of us in this Nation share in that loss.

I hope they quickly find the cure for his health problems and that he can, in some special way, continue his contribution to this Nation and to our world.●

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON LIBRARY AND INFORMATION SERVICES

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island and cosponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 112, authorizing and requesting the President to call a White House Conference on Library and Information Services to be held no later than 1989.

The first White House Conference, held in 1979, involved more than 100,000 people discussing the important issues that affect library and information services. As the United States increasingly becomes a mobile and informational society, an extreme demand has been placed on the sources and providers of information. The goal of the upcoming conference is to increase literacy, productivity, and an understanding of the democratic process through better utilization of our library system.

Libraries are the basic units for disseminating or otherwise making information available to the American citizenry. People of all ages use our libraries, and libraries can be found in most every community. Their importance cannot be overstated. Because of their unusual feature of being open to the public, it is extremely important that libraries have the most up-to-date resources and equipment. We must be able to meet the demand for information.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to consider this legislation seriously and to move quickly on its adoption.●

BOSTON MAYOR RAY FLYNN'S ST. PATRICK'S DAY MESSAGE

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, while St. Patrick's Day holds special meaning for those Americans of Irish descent, it is important for all our countrymen to reflect upon the meaning of this annual celebration.

For those of us who are fortunate to share an Irish ancestory, we take special pride in the contribution that Irish-Americans, from the time of the Revolutionary War to the present, have made to building a strong and vibrant nation.

Boston Mayor Ray Flynn, in his St. Patrick's Day Message, in my estimation, captured the essence of this two-centuries-old tradition in the United States.

As the mayor pointed out:

The celebration of the Feast of St. Patrick provides us with the opportunity to reflect on his essential message. As a man of peace and compassion, he was committed to bringing people together. His life is an example of selfless devotion to other human beings.

Mayor Flynn then chronicles the contributions of the Irish-American community to the teaching profession, politics, the arts, medicine, law, the clergy, and in such vital public services as police and fire departments.

Particularly noteworthy is the fact more Irish-Americans have been awarded the Medal of Honor than any other ethnic group in our country. Irish-Americans fought for our liberty and have been defending our liberties ever since the Revolutionary War. They are always on the front lines when America is most in need.

There is a special relationship between the United States and Ireland. It has been built upon decades of contributions that the Irish have made to the welfare and well-being of our country.

We owe a lot to the "Emerald Isle" and it is time that we return that debt of gratitude. And as the Mayor points out, for the first time in many years the United States Congress is showing an increased awareness of issues of concern to the Irish-American community from aid to Northern Ireland, to Irish immigration, to concerns that many of us have over the proposed United States-United Kingdom Extradition Treaty.

Mayor Flynn's concluding observation is particularly appropriate:

So on this Saint Patrick's Day, let us be proud of our heritage, and prouder still to be a vital part of America, the greatest country in the world.

I ask that Mayor Flynn's message be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

SAINT PATRICK'S DAY MESSAGE OF BOSTON MAYOR RAYMOND L. FLYNN

The celebration of Saint Patrick's Day has been a tradition in America for two centuries. The celebration of the Feast of Saint Patrick provides us with the opportunity to reflect on his essential message. As a man of peace and compassion, he was committed to bringing people together. His life is an example of selfless devotion to other human beings. In a Ireland of different tribes and traditions, he saw the Irish as one people under God.

Following Saint Patrick's example, the Irish in America have made great contributions of service to our nation. Their lives of service have been within the teaching profession, politics, the arts, medicine, law, the clergy, the religious life, or in such vital services as the police and fire departments of our cities. In addition, the Irish have made significant contributions in the labor movement and the business world.

Since the Revolutionary War, the Irish in America served our country in time of need. During the course of our two centuries, sons of Ireland have fought in every conflict in which our nation has been involved. Irish America proudly possesses the highest number of Medal of Honor recipients. That commitment to America's freedom is as strong as ever today.

Bearing in mind the contributions of service, along with the traditional importance attached by the Irish in America toward family life, Saint Patrick's Day should be seen as a celebration of the constructive efforts made by Irish Americans everyday of the year. Saint Patrick's Day help us to focus on the special relationship of the Irish in America. Irish Americans actively share in the wonderful diversity of peoples that in America. Today, as through the centuries, they join the many cultures of our society in making this country a land of opportunity where people can enjoy the benefits of liberty and raise their families.

We take pride in all the contributions that the Irish have made to life in these United States. We should also re-dedicate ourselves today to remembering Ireland.

The Irish American community in Boston, and in the United States as a whole, has reason to be gratified for the first time in many years that the U.S. Congress is showing an increased awareness on issues of concern to the Irish American community. The vital question of immigration reform is finally being addressed. Congressman Brian Donnelly must be applauded for his efforts to change this unfair policy.

The Thomas P. O'Neill Aid to Ireland and Northern Ireland Act of 1986 now includes the strong language necessary to guarantee that U.S. aid to Northern Ireland will be distributed in a manner promoting equal opportunity and non-discrimination in employment. This Act sends a message to Britain that we will be working with those attempting to correct the economic injustice that has been a central part of the problem in the Northern Ireland statelet since its inception 65 years ago.

The cycle of official violence, death and destruction in Northern Ireland will not end by increased security measures. To play a constructive role in finally establishing peace with justice for all of Ireland, it is important that the will of Congress is not beholden to maintaining the society of inequality the British policy has supported in Northern Ireland for too long. Helping to build a future for Ireland is in America's own national interest. As anywhere else, peace will come to Northern Ireland when justice prevails.

President John F. Kennedy, while visiting Ireland in June of 1963, expressed the sentiment, "While Ireland is not the land of my birth, it is a land for which I have very deep affections." His words should hold as much meaning for Irish Americans today, particularly in Boston, as they did 23 years ago.

As a young, vibrant, still-developing country, Ireland has given much to the United States. America can play a constructive role in building a new Ireland, an Ireland where all her children, of every tradition, will be cherished.

Over the years, Irish people have come to America in search of a better life. They encountered discrimination and overcame it. The obstacles placed in the path of earlier generations have been removed.

We are at our best remembering when one is diminished, so are we all. Irish America has not forgotten its struggle. Every Saint Patrick's Day we remember the long road traveled by our earlier generations and rejoice in the strong presence we have in America today.

So on this Saint Patrick's Day, let us be proud of our heritage, and prouder still to be a vital part of America, the greatest country in the world.●

NATIONAL NEIGHBORHOOD CRIME WATCH DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, every law-abiding citizen in this country is concerned about the ever-increasing crime rate. This is a well-founded concern. We are aware of what is, and should be, our response to this problem: We immediately turn to the criminal justice system for protection. But, with roughly 260 million Americans to be protected against crime, there simply are not enough law enforcement officials to be everywhere at once. In many cases, therefore, our response is to isolate ourselves in our homes and purchase a stronger door lock, a better burglar alarm, or even a gun.

Many concerned citizens in this country, however, have decided to change this situation. Many thousands have gathered together to take responsibility for themselves, their neighbors, and their communities. These are American citizens who, because of their justifiable concern for their own and their neighbor's safety, provide extra eyes and ears for local law enforcement officials.

These eyes and ears belong to neighborhood crime watch organizations working in communities across the country, such as, for example, civilian patrols. These are small groups, equipped with noisemakers and sometimes two-way radios, that walk or drive through neighborhood streets all hours of the day. If they see anything suspicious, they attempt to scare the offender and alert neighbors and passers-by. Then they report to the police. Other groups involve apartment dwellers who have formed tenant patrols to help prevent crime. The New York City Housing Authority has more than 13,000 volunteers patrolling in 700 of its buildings. And in Battle Creek, MI, police train senior citizens, housewives, and others as silent observers who anonymously have reported crimes and received cash awards for valuable information since 1970.

These organizations are important because protecting neighborhoods against burglaries and robberies is no longer a task that police forces can do alone. Nowhere is this more the case than in New York City, where neighborhood crime-prevention groups have more than doubled in the last 10 years. All it takes is a small group of individuals, each sharing one thing in common—an appreciation and concern for the community in which they live.

In 1980, 15 such individuals gathered together to form the 114th Civilian Patrol Inc., which operates out of the home of the 114th's president-chairman, James Pollock and his wife Barbara, in Astoria, NY. Now in its 6th year, its membership is 35 strong. These citizens actively participate in 17 to 21 patrols every month, covering in excess of 245 square blocks.

To date, these men and women have logged roughly 10,600 volunteer hours patrolling over 15,300 miles through the streets of Astoria, Long Island City, and Jackson Heights. Their efforts have resulted in five apprehensions and five convictions; and the discovery of 1,358 abandoned vehicles, 1,616 street light malfunctions, which provide criminals with a cover of darkness, and 1,718 potholes.

Mr. President, I commend to the attention of the Senate a brief summary of the type of work the 114th Civilian Patrol, Inc., is engaged in, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, the battle against crime is half won when our citizens take a few simple steps to lessen their chances of becoming victims. Keeping doors and windows locked is extremely important, yet frequently overlooked. It's surprising, but burglars don't always force their way in. About 50 percent of the time, they enter through an unlocked door or window, or by using a key. In fact, victims lose approximately $400 million every year through no force burglaries.

But by themselves, bigger locks won't stop crime, nor will police departments or neighborhood crime-prevention organizations. As these people tell us, we all must work together to ensure the safety of our streets. Groups like the 114th send a clear message to would-be criminals that their crimes will not go unnoticed, and that they stand a good chance of being caught. Those citizens deserve recognition who have decided to help tip the scales in favor of safer communities.

On behalf of these dedicated individuals, and on behalf of those they serve to protect, I urge my colleagues to join me in lending support to Senate Joint Resolution 256, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE]. This resolution recognizes and commends the efforts of our Nation's crime watch organizations by designating August 12, 1986, as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day."

The summary follows:

SUMMARY OF 114TH CIVILIAN OBSERVATION PATROL, INC.

The 114th Civilian Observation Patrol, Inc. was first formed on October 23, 1980 by fifteen people, each sharing one thing in common—a deep love and concern for the community in which they lived.

An average patrol consists of one or two base station operators, and at least two volunteers per patrol vehicle, a driver and an observer. Patrol vehicles belong to individual members and are unmarked. The volunteers are sent out with an FM radio, flashlight, map of the area to be patrolled, an amber light with permit, a fire extinguisher and a clip board with log sheet to record incidents or community nuisances. The patrol vehicle proceeds to its designated sector and drives up and down the streets at a speed comfortable enough for that team to observe thoroughly the areas they are passing through. Along with anything suspicious, they look for street light malfunctions, abandoned vehicles, pot holes, fire hydrant defects—anything that might cause a nuisance or possible danger to the community—and record them on their log sheets with exact addresses or street corner locations. Patrol units call into the dispatcher or base station operator every 20 minutes to a half hour to verify their safety and complete communication.

The amber light is not visible during any patrol. If the occasion should arise, as in the case of a mugging in progress, the dispatcher would advise the patrollers to expose the flashing amber light and beep the car horn in an effort to scare off the mugger and prevent the victim from further harm.

At no time does a volunteer become physically involved in an incident. If he tried to stop a mugging, for instance, he stands the chance of getting himself or those around him seriously or even fatally injured. If he attempts to move an injured party, he would stand liable for damages he might or might not have caused to that party. Therefore, a Civ-OP member's purpose is considered as being extra eyes and ears for his/her superiors (e.g. the Police Officer, an EMT unit, Fireman, etc.). These authorities cannot be expected to be everywhere at once, and civilians patrolling help to add an extra lookout for them.

At the end of a given patrol, complaints logged are checked against a list of previous complaints. If logged complaints are new, they are given to the proper agencies for prompt removal or repair. Special patrols are also scheduled to check the complaint list against improvements and repairs made, in an effort to keep these lists accurate. After four years of dedicated work, anyone can easily see the difference between areas covered by the Patrol and those areas that are not.

Through our own experience, by following the guidelines set by our Police Department, the mere fact of just observing and reporting an incident has proven to be beneficial to our community, and a tremendous help to our Police Department. There was a mugging in progress. The criminal beat a teenager, stole his wallet and took off in a car. The patrol unit on duty at the time gave the essential descriptions of the robber, the get-away car, the plate number and direction of get-away via FM radio to base station dispatcher. This lead to the apprehension of the criminal by the Police within seven minutes of the dispatcher's call to 911. No other witness on the scene offered to give this vital information, nor did they have a readily available means of communication to request help. The Civ-OP vehicle did, and so, they had proven to be a necessary, efficient and effective force in this community.

Further, it is the purpose of this group to deter crime within the boundaries of its activities. One less street light outage is one less "mugger's haven" and one less abandoned vehicle is one less "mugger's hideout". Residents of the areas we presently cover, enjoy a comparatively cleaner and safer neighborhood. And, a cleaner neighborhood looks less appealing to the criminal element, as this is the first sign to him that someone is "watching out" for problems. A well lit neighborhood with no abandoned buildings or vehicles to hide in, makes the criminal element easier to find and identify.

Our organization has periodically run other activities and programs. Some include a street light pole painting program for the neighborhood youths during the Summer of 1981, an abandoned cementary clean-up in April, 1982. Again, a special youth program was formed to help in the rehabilitation of an abandoned building purchased by a local civic group. Members of Civ-OP have also participated in special patrols to help escort senior citizens home after an affair or meeting. Our members have individually received numerous awards including Mayor's certificates, Senatorial awards and civic awards for their volunteership above and beyond the call of of duty.

We also run a court monitoring program in which some of the volunteers monitor the court proceedings of cases involving apprehensions our efforts were responsible for. This activity has proven to omit plea bargaining from the proceedings in many cases.

With the constant need for improvements in our community's quality of life and the persistent crime wave, our organization can only foresee a constant and steady increase of membership and improvements, benefiting any and all people living within its increasing boundaries.●

THE PVO LETTER ON CONTRA AID

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I would like to offer a few brief comments about an open letter to the Congress from U.S. private and voluntary organizations on aid to the Contras.

My colleagues are aware of my interest over the years in what have come to be called PVO's—private voluntary organizations which channel assistance from Americans on a people-to-people basis to those in distress around the world. All of us are rightly proud of the way the American people respond to the needs of people affected by disasters, refugees turmoil, and chronic hunger and poverty.

It is because of their commitment to development, and the breadth of their experience in the Third World that I have long supported PVO's and their role in our foreign assistance program. Since 1981 I have authored an amendment which mandates that a fixed percentage of our bilateral aid be channeled through these PVO's. I continue to believe that they represent the finest virtues in American society—an abiding concern for fellow human beings, and a desire to help others help themselves.

In addition to their humanitarian and development work in Third World countries, these agencies have become an important educational resource in helping Americans better understand the conditions which produce human suffering and require social change. Many PVO's have played a useful role in the public policy process, providing us with information not only about the needs but also effective ways of addressing them.

Given this background, I would like to commend to my colleagues a letter which each of you received today from the executives of eight major U.S. PVO's. The letter asks us to reject the administration's request for $100 million in aid to the Contras, both the $30 million in so-called humanitarian assistance and the $70 million in military aid.

I ask my colleagues to give careful consideration to the views expressed in the PVO letter. I do so not because they correspond with my own but for several other more important reasons. First, the eight signers are executives of agencies with broad international experience which is widely respected in the private voluntary community in this country and abroad.

Second, as the aid vote approaches and the rhetoric on both sides escalates, little attention is being given to the human impacts of U.S. policy in the region. Many of the PVO's who have written to us have programs throughout Central America and first-hand knowledge of the consequences involved with such a fateful decision.

Third, I am heartened by the courage of these groups in making their views known on such a controversial issue as Contra aid. Some may feel that PVO's undermine their impartiality in doing so. On the other hand, I hear them calling on the Congress to protect the integrity and impartiality of humanitarian aid at a time when it is being politicized by U.S. policy. Their opposition to military aid is based on the human toll it has taken.

Mr. President, I commend this letter to my colleagues, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The letter follows:

LETTER FROM EXECUTIVES OF PRIVATE AND VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS CONCERNING AID TO THE NICARAGUAN CONTRAS

MARCH 13, 1986.

DEAR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS: As you prepare to vote on assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras, we ask that you consider the views of organizations such as ours with long involvement in providing humanitarian assistance and with some familiarity with the human suffering caused by current US policy toward Nicaragua.

We recommend that you vote against providing $30 million in so-called humanitarian assistance to the Contras. Such aid distorts the concept of humanitarian aid as understood internationally and in the United States. It does not meet the customary tests: that humanitarian aid be made available solely on the basis of human need, not for political purposes; that it be offered impartially to all sides in a conflict; and that it go solely to civilians and non-combatants. Mislabelling the $30 million imperils the integrity of bona fide humanitarian aid and of agencies like our own that seek to provide it. It also risks the future of people whose life depends on it.

The $30 million is, of course, part of a larger $100 million request that includes $70 million for outright military aid. The pursuit of a military solution to the current conflict between the US and Nicaraguan governments is likely, we believe, to continue to create needless suffering among the poor in the region with whom we and our colleague agencies work. We urge Congress to insist on US actions that are regional and diplomatic in character. Such actions would be in keeping with the counsel of US allies in Central and South America and in Europe who have all opposed military aid to the Contras. We particularly lament the pressure brought by the Administration against governments that have opposed such aid, most recently the holding up of an AID development loan payment to Costa Rica.

We therefore urge your rejection of the Administration's $100 million request, both its so-called humanitarian assistance and military aid elements. While some are considering a "compromise" that, in one way or another, would approve the former while rejecting the latter, what would be compromised, we believe, would be the integrity of humanitarian aid itself.

Given the reality of human need in the Nicaraguan/Honduran border area, we urge that the US provide humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons wherever they are, through international organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Because the US is a party to the conflict, we would urge against the provision of humanitarian aid through bilateral channels.

Thank you for giving consideration to our views.

NUCLEAR LIABILITY

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the lead editorial that appeared in today's New York Times. In view of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee's current efforts to mark up and report out a bill to renew and amend the Price-Anderson Act, I feel that this editorial is most timely.

The subject of my committee's markup is S. 1225, a bill that Senator SIMPSON and I introduced last year. This bill retains the basic structure of Price-Anderson, including the concepts of channeling of liability, pooling of insurance, limiting each utility's obligations with respect to another utility's accident, and providing prompt compensation to the victims of an accident. But our bill goes several steps further. First, it increases the liability coverage from the current level of $640 million to a level of approximately $2.4 billion. Furthermore, in the event of an incident causing damages in excess of this amount of coverage, the Congress would be required to act on additional compensation plans under expedited procedures in order to provide for full, equitable, and efficient compensation and relief of all valid claims. Finally, the bill provides for liability coverage of nuclear activities under contract with the Department of Energy, including activities related to the transportation, storage, and disposal of radioactive waste.

Mr. President, it would be ironic, and perhaps even tragic, if Congress chose to dismantle the Price-Anderson structure at the very time that other industries are beginning to look at Price-Anderson as the basis upon which to model their own systems for liability coverage.

I feel that, because of these considerations, it would be in the best interest of our country that Congress renew Price-Anderson in a form that will continue to provide the best public protection possible, without destroying the key elements that are responsible for the very success of the Price-Anderson system.

Mr. President, I ask that the New York Times' editorial to which I refer be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 14, 1986]

IF THERE'S A NUCLEAR DISASTER, WHO PAYS?

Indian citizens injured in the Bhopal disaster in December 1984 have yet to receive a cent of compensation; their Government's case awaits trial in American courts. When Pennsylvanians had to evacuate after the nuclear accident at Three Mile Island in 1979, however, emergency payments started within 24 hours. Why the difference? Because the liability insurance of nuclear plants is governed by a special law. But Congress should renew that law, the Price-Anderson Act which expires next year, because the alternative is a lot worse.

The act is arbitrary and unfair; yet compared with the tort system's handling of mass claims, it looks pretty good. It sets a ceiling, now $630 million, on claims payable after a nuclear accident, and channels all liability to the plant operator. That makes liability insurance affordable for nuclear utilities, and protects suppliers whose products might be implicated in an accident. Insurers pay out promptly because there's no legal tangle over who was at fault for damage beyond a plant's site.

But what if a nuclear accident caused more than $630 million in damage off-site? Excess losses would be unfairly borne by the victims—or, if Congress enacted special legislation, the taxpayer. A multibillion-dollar accident is conceivable. If nuclear power is now a mature enterprise, why shouldn't it insure for the full cost of doing business? Because only so much insurance is available; $160 million per plant is all that worldwide insurance pools offer. Under Price-Anderson, each of the 94 operating plants would pay $5 million to a $470 million fund, making up the $630 million ceiling.

Even that, however, is not good enough. Congress should raise that ceiling to at least $2 billion by requiring each plant to contribute $20 million in event of a disaster. But the basic structure of Price-Anderson is sound. To remove the ceiling altogether would make the best-run utilities, like Duke Power with seven reactors, even more unfairly vulnerable to the errors of the worst. Injured citizens would probably gain more from a $2 billion fund than by suing a nearly bankrupt utility.

If the act is not renewed, the liability ceiling will stay at a mere $630 million for the lifetime of all plants now in being. So why does the nuclear industry seek renewal at all? Because the absence of insurance would prevent development of a new, safer generation of nuclear plants.

The opponents of Price-Anderson argue that the act diminishes the powerful safety incentive created by insurance premiums that reflect good management. Despite the lesson of Three Mile Island, hair-raising examples of not-so-good management continue. In 1983, at New Jersey's Salem 2 plant, the emergency shutdown system failed twice within a week. A 1985 incident at the Davis-Besse plant in Ohio was a near-repeat of that at Three Mile Island. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission rightly hands out heavy fines for such sloppy practices, but it cannot reward good performance.

One day, as utilities become more deregulated, nuclear utilities should learn to manage more of their own risk. For now, renewal of Price-Anderson is the best policy.●

GROWING PAINS FOR OSHKOSH

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to bring some good economic news from Wisconsin to my colleagues; 91 years ago, Oshkosh B'Gosh, Inc., was founded in Oshkosh, WI. In addition to their long history of success in the manufacturing of clothing, the Oshkosh B'Gosh label has—in the past few years—become a status symbol in children's wear.

Last month, as the chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee's Subcommittee on Entrepreneurship and Problems Facing Small Businesses, I held three field hearings in Wisconsin to focus attention on the entrepreneurial spirit in America today. Although we spotlighted businesses which have emerged in recent years, it may have been appropriate to include the leadership from the Oshkosh B'Gosh company—appropriate because in the past few years, this company has found a new niche in the marketplace—something which all entrepreneurs must do to be successful.

During most of its history, Oshkosh B'Gosh has been famous for turning out overalls and other work clothers which were used by farmers, factory workers, and railroad employees. But as the employment declined in these areas because of changing economic conditions, sales began to dip.

Instead of allowing itself to fall victim to changing times, Oshkosh B'Gosh began selling children's overalls. Something clicked. The parents of the 1980's were so enthralled by the idea of putting their children in miniature versions of their parents' work clothes that before long, everyone from Bloomingdale's to the Boston Store was selling Oshkosh B'Gosh's clothing lines.

As a testament to their growth, company president Charles Hyde, Jr., has watched his sales rise from $47 million in 1981 to $162 million last year—growth of around 350 percent.

Mr. President, again, as everyone in recent years has been writing off the economic viability of the Midwest, we have yet another example of positive growth that translates into good news for us all. And it once again proves that ingenuity in the Midwest and Wisconsin is far from dead. I ask that a story on Oshkosh B'Gosh's success, which appeared in the New York Times Business Day section on February 22, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

GROWING PAINS FOR OSHKOSH

MOVE TO SLOW SOARING SALES

(By Steven Greenhouse)

OSHKOSH, WI.—Oshkosh B'Gosh Inc., the manufacturer famous for its children's overalls, has a problem that most companies wish they had: It has grown too big for its britches.

Oshkosh, a 91-year-old company long known for its drab overalls and other work clothes, experienced a phenomenal growth spurt in recent years after it discovered that parents adore putting their sons and daughters in pint-size overalls. As a result, Oshkosh's sales more than tripled to $162 million in 1985, from $47 million four years before.

"We had a few years of unbelievable growth," said Charles F. Hyde Jr., the company's polished, white-haired president and chief executive officer. "All of that growth was a result of children's clothes."

SERIOUS GROWING PAINS

But in selling so many children's overalls, dungarees, jumpers, knit shirts and blouses, Oshkosh has suffered serious growing pains.

Despite contracting out work, its 11 factories often cannot keep up with demand. Deliveries sometimes arrive late. stores have been put on an allocation, or quota, system.

"It's hard to sustain a growth rate of 40 to 50 percent a year," acknowledged Mr. Hyde, whose company is based in this lakeside city of 55,000 between Milwaukee and Green Bay. "I don't know if we would want to grow that fast even if we could."

The 65-year-old chief executive expressed fears that if Oshkosh continued growing so fast, it might someday saturate the market and fall flat on its face, as Izod did when demand for its faddish alligator leveled off. So Mr. Hyde has throttled back the company's growth.

"They've decided to try to manage the growth rather than vice versa," said Jay E. Van Cleave, an analyst with Robert W. Baird & Company in Milwaukee.

PRODUCTION CONTRACTED OUT

Instead of building factory after factory, Oshkosh has deliberately kept its capacity below demand. Last year it contracted out production of about one-third of the 21 million garments it sold. If demand trails off, Oshkosh will let its contracts lapse, rather than get stuck with expensive idle capacity.

There's more to running a profitable business than having it grow," said Mr. Hyde, whose father-in-law bought a controlling share of Oshkosh in 1934. "We're now looking at those things that have suffered in recent years. Our customers want a dependable resource that they can count on."

Its goal is to limit sales growth to a still-ambitious 15 percent a year. At that rate, company sales would top $300 million in 1990.

[Oshkosh said Friday that its earnings for 1985 were $14 million, up only 10 percent from the previous year because of the cost of building a new plant and relocating another one.]

Mr. Hyde's decision to slow Oshkosh's growth comes after a generational skirmish at the company. "Some of us younger folks always say: 'Let's go for it. Lets run for the roses,'" said Michael D. Wachtel, Mr. Hyde's 32-year-old-son-in-law and Oshkosh's director of operations. "But Mr. Hyde has some experience that teaches us. He often says, 'Fashion is fickle.'"

LACKLUSTER STYLES FOR 80 YEARS

In its first 30 years, however, Oshkosh worried little about fashion. It sold sturdy, lackluster work clothes to farmers, railroad workers and factory hands. In the last decade, its work clothes sales have slipped, none too surprisingly, because economic changes caused a decline in factory, farm and railroad employment.

But in the 1900's, Oshkosh happened upon an alternative market: children, the sons and daughters of the baby-boom generation. The discovery came soon after a mail order house based here, the Miles Kimball Company, include Oshkosh's children's denim overalls and kickory-striped overalls in its catalogue. The overalls—the type one imagines Tom Sawyer used to wear—sold like hotcakes.

"Their success made us begin to see what we had," said Douglas W. Hyde, the chief executive's 35-year-old son and the vice president for merchandising.

Because its sales force concentrated on work clothes, Oshkosh used direct mail to promote its children's wear to dozens of specialty shops and department stores.

Bloomingdale's placed a large order. Other department store buyers followed. Now, children's wear accounts for 80 percent of Oshkosh's sales, up from 15 percent in 1979.

'A STATUS ITEM'

"Oshkosh has become a status item dear to the contemporary mother," said Roger F. Farrington, manager of the youth apparel department for Marshall Field's in Chicago. "It's basic everyday play wear that is well styled has nice colors and wears well."

As styles changed, Oshkosh moved from just plain and striped overalls to more fashionable ones. Indeed, it has done with children's overalls what George Washington Carver did with the peanut. Oshkosh has come up with baggy overalls, painter's overalls, overalls with crossover straps, overalls with short legs called shortalls and overalls with bright prints that look like fingerpaint.

"It started out as reverse snob appeal," said the elder Mr. Hyde of the denim and striped overalls. "It became popular when everyone was dressing down, wearing overalls and five-pocket jeans. They were dressing their children the same way as themselves.

"But today," he continued, "people are dressing with a more upbeat fashion look, so we have introduced a more upbeat product line."

In addition, Oshkosh—recognizing that parents buy two tops for each bottom that a child wears—started to sell knit blouses, shirts, sweaters and jackets. The tops, which were introduced in 1981, now represent one-third of the company's children's wear sales.

SEEKING PROSPEROUS CUSTOMERS

Oshkosh officials say they are going after prosperous customers. The company's prices are lower than Ralph Lauren's Polo line for children, but generally more expensive than such competitors as Health-Tex, Carter's and Buster Brown. Its children's shirts and blouses sell for $10 to $12 and its jeans, pants and overalls sell for $12.50 to $25.

"More children are being born nowadays, and couples are having them later in life, when they're able to spend more on clothes," said Brenda Gall, an analyst with Merrill Lynch. "In addition, many families are having fewer children, so they have more money to spread around for clothes. And maybe they want to buy better things for their children because they feel guilty because both parents are working."

Charles Hyde said Oshkosh can thrive, even though production costs at its plants in Tennessee, Kentucky and Wisconsin are higher than the cost of imported goods, because the company is known for high quality. Besides, he said, "We're perceived as an All-American product."

Mr. Hyde's family and in-laws retain control of the company's voting stock even though Oshkosh and the controlling families sold $19.7 million in common stock at $25 a share in a secondary offering last May. The stock has jumped since then.

[Oshkosh closed Friday at $42 a share, up $1, in over-the-counter trading.]

A PUSH IN THE SOUTH

To maintain growth, Oshkosh—which is strong in the East, Middle West and West—is making a big push across the South.

Oshkosh has licensing agreements with manufacturers in Canada and Mexico. It thinks it can prosper by signing such agreements in the Common Market.

Oshkosh is also allowing Burlington Industries to make a line of children's towels and sheets.

"We've been approached by a lot of people who want to license our name," Douglas Hyde said, as sewing machines hummed in the factory one floor above the corporate offices. "If the product is right, we'll look at it. Chances are we'll stick to apparel. You probably won't see Oshkosh lunchboxes."

Oshkosh has moved, however, into sleepwear, hats and mittens. It recently abandoned a new line of maternity wear because the market was so hard too break into.

MORE ATTENTION TO OLDER CHILDREN

The company, which now focuses on girls and boys below the age of 6, plans to pay more attention to older children as the offspring of the baby boomers grow up.

"I'm less sanguine about the prospects for some of the newer areas," said Miss Gall of Merrill Lynch. "I don't think mothers will necessarily spend premium prices on sleepwear. Since the neighbors don't see the sleepwear on the child, mothers might want to be more price conscious."

And she sees problems for Oshkosh in the market for ages 6 through 12. "As soon as children start picking out their own things, it becomes a different ball game," she said. "In the larger sizes, boys are going to want to wear what their big brother is wearing, not what their little brother is wearing."

But Oshkosh executives have heard critics say many times before that they were a fad that would blow over.

"Our popularity has started to level off," Douglas Hyde acknowledged. "But I don't think that one day parents will wake up and say, 'Ugh, we don't want Oshkosh anymore.'"

He added, "I'm confident that if we can keep our product current and contemporary-looking, we'll be in business for the long haul."

SANDINISTA RELIGIOUS OPPRESSION

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, on many occasions I have addressed my colleagues on the Soviet-Cuban-sponsored tragedy now occurring in Nicaragua.

On this occasion, I wish to address one specific aspect of that because I have a significant contribution, a recently made public letter, which helps to answer the question of whether and to what degree the freedom of religion is assaulted by the Sandinistas.

I personally met in Managua in December 1983 with cardinal, then archbishop, Obando y Bravo. That is not the subject I am going to talk about, but I met with him along with Pedro Chamorro, the persecuted, former publisher of La Prensa, who has since fled that country after a great display of gallantry.

I remind my colleagues that Pedro's father was the publisher of La Prensa under Somoza. He was killed under that regime. Then Pedro, his son, was harassed and finally chased out of the country by the Sandinista regime in his effort to tell the truth insofar as the censorship would bear, in Nicaragua. He finally fled.

But, on that afternoon, they both assured me that Mr. Borge—and I remind my colleagues that in those days he was trumpeting that the Sandinista government was easing its pressure against freedom of religion and the press—both of those gentlemen, the archbishop and the publisher, assured me that Borge was lying. It was an interesting afternoon.

I have seen the archbishop, now cardinal, since that time. I cannot relate what went on between us, but I have a letter to him, which I am going to refer to, that was made public just a few days ago.

The letter addresses the answer to the question about the freedom of religion. The Sandinistas and some misled American Catholics have preferred to portray Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo as a conspirator with the regime's opposition; in other words, that Obando y Bravo is not to be trusted. They try to show that he is not a real voice of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua and that he is simply one of the Contras.

We have the complication of a so-called popular state-promoted Catholic Church in Nicaragua. Those people do not speak for the Catholic Church but, rather, for the Marxist government there.

In addition, we have misled Americans who believe that the Sandinista regime is OK. We have some Maryknolls saying they are OK. We have some liberation theologians saying they are OK. So a question has been raised as to what is the real Roman Catholic Church position on Nicaragua. Are the pro-Red faction of the liberation theologians correct, or are they "useful idiots," in the terminology of the Communists?

On that question, incidentally, Mr. President, I held hearings. The hearings were on liberation theology and Latin America, but I doubt that many of my colleagues are aware of those hearings.

Those hearings were not reported extensively in the media.

But on this subject today, the question of what is the real Catholic position on Nicaragua, we have, in our Northeastern States in particular, anxiety on the part of some of my colleagues because they are being told by Catholics, including some nuns and some priests, that they think that the Sandinista government is fine. Today,

I hope those colleagues will listen to authorities who are speaking for the Catholic Church and speaking for the first time.

I refer to a letter made public on March 16, of this year by two United States cardinals, both from the Northeast, who have written to Archbishop Obando y Bravo in most eloquent terms, expressing their solidarity with Cardinal Obando y Bravo and with the Nicaraguan people who are fighting against the existing government.

They do so not only to lend strength to the Nicaraguan brethren but for the benefit of the religious faithful in the United States, and I hope for the clarity of mind of the Senate of the United States.

On the eve of the Senate vote on our President's proposal to provide aid to the United Democratic Opposition in Nicaragua, I commend this letter from Cardinals Law and O'Connor to my colleagues. Cardinal Law is the Archbishop of Boston. His full name is Bernard Cardinal Law. The other gentleman is a friend of mine from Navy days. When I returned from Vietnam, he was still a chaplain. He was the first Catholic chief of chaplains in the Navy. That gentleman's name is John Cardinal O'Connor, archbishop of New York.

Mr. President, I would like to read the letter in its entirety and then ask that it appear in that fashion in the RECORD.

YOUR EMINENCE: The present trials through which you and the Church in Nicaragua are suffering are a poignant reminder that the mystery of the Cross continues to be lived in the Body of Christ. During this Lent, your two brother bishops in the United States, who were called to membership in the College of Cardinals with you last May, have often thought of you and discussed the courageous efforts you make for the well-being of the Church and the people of Nicaragua. We have taken the extraordinary step of making this letter public so that the faithful in our archdioceses and as many as possible in our country will know what is actually happening to their brothers and sisters in Nicaragua.

We share your deep pain when your people are denied full opportunity to build a just, peaceful and progressive society based on the transcendent dignity of each human person. We know your suffering when attempts are made to violate the religious conscience of Nicaraguans by denying them access to the liberating teachings of the Church. This has been done by physical harassment, crude attempts at intimidation, and censorship. Priests have been summarily expelled from your country. Offices of your archdiocese have been raided by military personnel and remain under military occupation. The archdiocesan newspaper, Iglesia, was confiscated after its first edition, and the Catholic radio remains closed. You are subjected to a barrage of distortions, slanderous insults and innuendo at home and by some representatives of the government abroad.

In this ordeal, the Church in Nicaragua has been seeking to maintain the constructive dialogue with the government in an attempt to reach a climate of mutual respect so that the Church can play a role in the reconstruction of your country. We want to assure you of our solidarity with you. With you we are praying for that peaceful reconciliation necessary to rekindle the original hope of the revolution. For this to take place, it is essential that there be an immediate cessation of the present unjust restrictions suffered by the Church and other sectors of Nicaraguan society. This will undoubtedly provide a powerful impetus for the just resolution of the conflicts in your country and in that strife torn region.

Be assured of our prayers and support, our brother Cardinal, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the "Most Pure," as the Nicaraguan people particularly venerate her.

Fraternally yours in Christ,

BERNARD CARDINAL LAW,
Archbishop of Boston
JOHN CARDINAL O'CONNOR,
Archbishop of New York.

Mr. President, in no way do I mean to imply that either of the cardinals are trying to intervene in our vote on this particular matter, but they are, by their letter, clarifying their solidarity with former archbishop, now Cardinal Obando y Bravo, who has bravely stood in Nicaragua and maintains that the church is indeed being persecuted as this letter confirms.

So that should clear up for my colleagues in New York and other Northeastern States any problem they might have. I have heard that expressed by some of them. I respect their expressions about any ambiguity regarding the Catholic Church's position respecting freedom of religion in Nicaragua and present conditions there. The cardinals are very clear in the letter, however, writing in such explicit terms that:

Offices of your archdiocese have been raided by military personnel and remain under military occupation. The archdiocesan newspaper, Iglesia, was confiscated after its first edition, and the Catholic radio remains closed.

So if there were any doubts about it, I hope they have been dispelled, and I hope that the letter contributes to our contemplation as we approach the day on which we vote on the aid to those who are trying to fight to redeem the revolution which this country decided to support and even aided.

I will conclude by saying, having heard the President's speech and the Democratic response, so-called, I certainly support the President, and I hope that my colleagues will do the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3128) "An Act to make changes in spending and revenue provisions for purposes of deficit reduction and program improvement, consistent with the budget process," with an amendment.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 332. An act for the relief of Ramzi Sallomy and Marie Sallomy; and

S. 992. An act to discontinue or amend certain requirements for agency reports to Congress.

DR. J. DALTON HAVARD

(Mr. DELAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to rise and introduce Members of the House to Dr. Dalton Havard, our guest Chaplain today. Dr. Havard is pastor of the Sugar Creek Baptist Church in Sugar Land, TX, and comes to us with a distinguished background.

Following service in the Air Force during World War II, Dr. Havard completed his undergraduate work at Baylor University and went on for his master's degree from Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. He was ordained in the North Main Baptist Church of Houston in July 1945.

Since entering the ministry, Dr. Havard has had a distinguished career of preaching and service, both here and abroad. He has traveled and preached extensively throughout South America, the Middle East, Asia, and Europe. In recognition of his international efforts, he was given an honorary doctorate degree from Odowara College in Odowara, Japan.

He has pastored seven other Baptist congregations in Texas before coming to Sugar Creek Baptist. Dr. Havard has served on the Baptist Denominational Board, the executive board of the Baptist General Convention of Texas and the board of trustees of the East Texas Baptist College.

As a member of his congregation in Sugar Land, I am proud to have Dr. Havard honored as our guest Chaplain today.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). This is the day for the call of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will call the bill on the Private Calendar.

STEVEN McKENNA

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1598) for the relief of Steven McKenna.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This concludes the call of the Private Calendar.

OMNIBUS DIPLOMATIC SECURITY AND ANTITERRORISM ACT

(Mr. COLEMAN of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to review and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the basic principles of freedom, justice, and concern for human life on which our Nation was founded have survived major threats during the course of our history. Today, we face a challenge to these ideals in the form of terrorism, an increasingly serious threat to the United States. It is my firm belief that the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act will enable us to combat terrorism and eventually triumph in this struggle.

Sadly, there has been a growing trend by individuals, groups, and in some cases, governments to resort to terrorism on an international scale in the pursuit of their political aims. Left unchanged, the rise of terrorism will undermine the system of political and economic relationships upon which the United States and its allies have come to rely. We must be prepared for continued threats, much of it supported or encouraged by a handful of ruthless governments.

The challenge is clearly before us. It is my belief that this legislation will provide the United States with the capability to prevail, and I urge its speedy adoption by the House of Representatives.

SUPPORT URGED FOR CONTRA AID

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to review and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, last week, Nicaraguan Ambassador to the United States Carlos Tunnerman said his country might not have to ask the Soviets for any more military aid if the Congress approves military assistance for the Contras. Ambassador Tunnerman says the Nicaraguans might not need it.

What does that say about the military balance in Central America? After the Soviets have supplied more than $500 million in military hardware since the Sandinistas came to power, the Nicaraguans now overwhelm their Central American neighbors in weaponry and manpower.

If we approve military aid for the democratic resistance, the Nicaraguans are confident they already have enough military force to counter them. If we don't approve military aid for the Contras, how will the Communist Sandinistas use that military superiority? They'll use it against their neighbors in Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala, and anywhere else in Latin America where their covert arms flow.

We must support military assistance to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua to counter the overwhelming military strength of the Communist Sandinistas.

LATEST SENATE AMENDMENTS TO RECONCILIATION CONTRARY TO SENSE OF EQUITY AND FAIR PLAY

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice my frustrations over the reconciliation bill that will be back before us today on a motion to concur with the latest round of amendments made in the other body.

Had this Congress done its job last fall with budget reconciliation, we could have saved the taxpayers nearly $75 billion over 3 years. But we have played politics, we have bounced this back and forth between Chambers, and we have let this savings dwindle to maybe only about $13 or $14 billion.

And in doing so, we have caused a lot of headaches, especially for health care providers waiting for our final word about Medicare reimbursement rates for 1986.

But through it all, Nebraska's hospitals have been patient—waiting and hoping that we would get this bill enacted and along with it, finally, a new area wage index for calculating Medicare payments to hospitals.

Nebraska's hospitals can tell you a lot about patience. They have waited for nearly 3 years for the Health Care Financing Administration to respond to the intent of Congress and the letter of the law and correct the wage index and correct it retroactively.

The language in reconciliation seems to be the final hope, but the hospitals that have been penalized for 3 years under the DRG system gave up a lot for this last grasp at fairness. Medicare underpaid them millions of dollars since 1983, but they are willing to forgive this debt for the revised index. And they are efficient hospitals, making the new DRG system work to their advantage, but they agreed to go along with delaying the phasein of the payment system.

But now, on a motion to concur with the amendments of the other body, we are going to give Oregon hospitals their own set of DRG rates and a windfall of $20 to $30 million from Medicare. No matter the patience of Nebraska's hospitals, no matter their problems, no matter the problems of hospitals in the other 48 States trying to cope and make the new prospective payment system work.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment is a slap in the face to Nebraska's hospitals and it is contrary to any sense of equity and fair play.

HISTORY IS REPEATING ITSELF ONCE AGAIN

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I have always suspected there are too many people making history who have never read history.

History tells us that in 1928 the United States of America invaded Nicaragua, set up the Somoza dictatorship, and we were able to prop up that dictatorship for about 45 years, at which time the people of Nicaragua exchanged one dictator for another.

Now the great issue before the Congress is whether we will try to take the fellow who was thrown out of the bar and is telling us, "Carry me back in, I can lick any man in the house."

The Contras are really the Somoza people as far as the military is concerned. I point out that Maj. Donald El Toro—that means bull—Torres, was a high-ranking officer in Somoza's National Guard. He is now a counterintelligence officer in the so-called Contra Freedom Fighters.

They run the military; they are some sort of a civilian front our State Department has set up, but history is repeating itself.

Speaking of repeating things in history, let me tell you what Will Rogers said in 1928:

> The United States of America will send the Marines into any country where we can get 10 people to invite us.

GOOD NEWS-BAD NEWS

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the good news is that interest rates are falling worldwide: from 4 to 3½ percent in West Germany, from 4½ to 4 percent in Japan, and from 7½ to 7 percent in the United States. The bad news is that unemployment jumped from 6.7 to 7.3 percent in February, the steepest monthly increase in this country since 1980, in spite of the anticipated reduction in interest rates. Commentators were quick to dismiss the bad news as a "schizophrenic aberration of no consequence."

But is it, really? Our interest rates and unemployment figures are perfectly consistent with our trade deficit at $150 billion last year. As long as the cost of borrowing money to West German and Japanese producers is one-half of that to American producers, it is futile to expect that money will flow into productive enterprise and into stock, bond and foreign exchange speculation. The stock market lives on its own dreams, dreaming that greenmail, leveraged buyouts, stock buybacks, and other incestuous practices can make for prosperity. The fact is that they can only make for the hollowing of American industry.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one way to bring down interest rates to the levels enjoyed by our competitors, and thereby lay the foundation for capital accumulation and reward employment opportunities in this country. We must bring down the cost of Government borrowing to 2¼ to 2½ percent, by issuing gold bonds. After we have done this, all the news will be good.

TRUTH SQUAD

(Mr. KLECZKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the administration dispatched nine Republican members on a 19-hour, taxpayer-funded junket for jingo-ism to Central America.

Nine partisan conclusions in search of rationale and justification.

These sentinels of the "truth" will tell us the way it is in Nicaragua. But I ask my nine colleagues:

Did you question the Contra representatives on their own human rights abuses? What did they say?

Did you ask them why, after more than $250 million in United States aid thus far, they are no closer to democratizing the Sandinista regime? What did they say?

Did you ask them why, if their cause is just, they have been utterly unable to capture the spirit and commitment of the Nicaraguan people? What did they say?

Where was the bipartisan representation we've been urged to embrace on this issue of national security?

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the administration will stop at nothing to sell a policy the American people won't buy.

UNIFORM PRODUCT LIABILITY ACT

(Mr. SHUMWAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's liability insurance crisis made front-page headlines again today, with the announcement that the President has been presented with a "sweeping set" of recommendations for addressing this growing problem. Assistant Attorney General Richard K. Willard has stated that the growing crisis is "being felt in virtually every segment of American society." The expanding definitions of "liability" is resulting in more frequent, more generous court awards, and the end result is grim. In some cases, liability insurance is not available at all. In others, premiums are so staggering that those who should be covered by it choose to "go bare," rather than go broke. And, in all cases, consumers are footing the bill. As the primary House sponsor of the Uniform Product Liability Act, I believe there is a responsible solution to this problem, one which will meet the recommendations brought to the President's attention and which will protect consumers as well as manufacturers. I urge Members to examine this bill and join this effort to solve a growing problem in America.

COL. ENRIQUE BERMUDEZ, FORMER AIDE TO SOMOZA

(Mr. BONIOR of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in 1978, the OAS condemned the Nicaraguan National Guard for its "numerous atrocities" in the face of a popular insurrection, including its "mass murders of minors and summary executions of civilians * * *."

At that same time, Somoza had sent to Washington one of his closest aides, a full colonel in the national guard, whose job it was to seek further U.S. aid to prop up the dictator's endangered regime.

The man Somoza picked for the highly-prized position of military attache in Washington was Col. Enrique Bermudez—the same Colonel Bermudez who is now supreme commander of the Contras.

It was Bermudez who, shortly after Somoza fell, formed the Argentine-funded 15th of September Legion, which carried out sabotage raids and assassinations inside Nicaragua, and it was Bermudez who, in 1981, was the key to founding the CIA-funded FDN.

Today, the presence of Bermudez, and his cronies, guarantee that the Contras will never have widespread popular support inside Nicaragua. If we continue to fund them, we will do no more than perpetuate the campaign of terror that has always been the trademark of the dreaded national guard.

SUPPORT H.R. 2453, OLDER AMERICANS ACT OF 1965

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge support for H.R. 2453, an authorization to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965, which will be voted on later today.

At the beginning of 1985, individual States were promised a reimbursement of 56.76 cents for every dollar spent on feeding the elderly. In November of 1985, the USDA decided to change their minds and only reimburse 53 cents of the dollar instead of the original 56.76 cents.

In 5 months this has cost my State of Maryland $144,000. H.R. 2453 would refund this cost of $144,000 to the State and restore an amount more appropriate to the States' requirements.

It's a poor savings that is taken out of a food program for our elderly. I hope many in this body will agree that it is our responsibility for providing proper food for our seniors. Surely, we are not so desperate as to try to save money by starving our elderly.

We must pass H.R. 2453.

OIL SPILL AT SHALLOTTE POINT, NC

(Mr. ROSE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, about 8 o'clock last night in my congressional district in the inland waterway at a place known as Shallotte Point a barge ruptured, having hit an underground obstacle, and some 80,000 gallons of very thick No. 6 bunker oil is now floating in the water in the area around Shallotte Point.

The Coast Guard and a private contractor are on the scene attempting to make the best of a very horrible situation.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I am going to meet with the Director of the Corps of Engineers from Wilmington, NC, and urge him to take a very close look at Shallotte Point and the navigation problems that this bend in the intercoastal waterway presents.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are all urging agencies of the Government to save money, we should be very carefull not to tie the hands of agencies such as the Corps of Engineers where we may wind up being penny-wise and pound-foolish by not giving them the funds they need to make our waterways safe.

RENEW THE TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

(Mr. WORTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, this country is suffering a $150 billion trade deficit. To many who set that figure in the newspapers, it is just another number in the string of deficit statistics.

But to many of my constituents and others around this Nation, the trade deficit is very real. It means lost jobs and fewer opportunities. While Congress plays politics with the trade adjustment assistance program, laid-off workers in central New York are suffering and wondering where—or what—their next job will be.

These people need help to get back on their feet. They have been shocked to find out that they have to go back to school to remain in the work force. Under current conditions, they do not have the chance to learn a new job skill, because they must take any job that is available once their initial unemployment benefits run out.

The time is now for my colleagues in both Houses of Congress to approve a package that will help these laid-off workers. Renewal of the trade adjustment assistance program cannot be delayed any longer. Workers who have been hit by unfair import competition cannot claim crucial extensions of unemployment benefits, because of partisan delays in approving the budget reconciliation package.

We in Congress have shown our intent for this program by our votes last year to extend it temporarily. We must follow through on this promise to let U.S. workers know that faith in American opportunity is not misplaced.

"EL CHINO," SO-CALLED FREEDOM FIGHTER

(Mr. EVANS of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan is asking us to give $100 million to the Contras, who he compares to the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers.

That money would be spent on the likes of Ricardo Lau, also known as "El Chino."

El Chino, according to a Salvadoran Army colonel, is the "founding father" who arranged the murder of Salvadoran Archibishop Romero while he was celebrating mass in 1980. He is the so-called freedom fighter who commanded a massacre of civilians in a church near Jinotepe during the revolution. It was this "George Washington" and his associates who have orchestrated assassinations and robberies in Nicaragua and Honduras.

"El Chino was an original member of the 15th of September Legion and the FDN; but before that, he was a major in Somoza's National Guard. As chief of intelligence operations, he arranged for hundreds of political arrests and supervised or approved torture and executions.

Now he commands a special counter-intelligence unit which operates in Honduras, carrying out the execution of suspected Sandinista informers.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is wrong to spend $100 million of taxpayer money on such men as El Chino. He is not my idea of one of our Nation's Founding Fathers.

A TIME FOR REAL DEFICIT REDUCTION

(Mr. BOULTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, the House now has a chance to engage in some real deficit reduction of the Federal deficit, instead of just playing the kind of political games that characterized last week's activities.

The omnibus reconciliation bill of 1985 is being returned today from the other body, this time in a form we are assured has administration approval. Since it would produce deficit reduction of about $25 billion over the next 3 years, now is finally the time to pass it. It is my understanding that the agreement with the administration is fragile and any attempts to change the bill further would jeopardize the chances of Presidential approval.

Most of the various add-ons which would have made this reconcilation bill a spending rather than a saving measure are now gone. So is the Superfund portion, which aroused such controversy. Superfund will be handled later, in separate legislation.

The Budget Committee will need the savings in this bill as it tackles the job of keeping the Government on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings track of a balanced budget by 1991. The responsible, statesmanlike thing to do is to approve the reconciliation bill as it now stands, locking in the savings that it contains. Then move on, in the weeks ahead, to consideration of a budget resolution which will meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target for fiscal year 1987.

INTRODUCTION OF TELEPHONE DECENCY ACT OF 1986

(Mr. BLILEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Telephone Decency Act of 1986. The purpose of this bill is to amend section 223 of the Communications Act of 1934 to prohibit obscene and indecent communications by means of telephone for commercial purposes.

Mr. Speaker, nearly 2½ years ago we addressed this issue in the House. We thought we came up with an effective means of stopping children's access to these obscene and indecent tape recordings. Yet, today, dial-a-porn services have spread to many major cities throughout the United States. Four of the seven major telephone companies now carry this service and a fifth is considering it.

The nature of these communications is clearly obscene and, as such, unprotected by the first amendment. It is time to end the use of our public phone system as a distribution network for sodomy and perversion. Parents are begging for our help. Our children need our help. I ask each and every one of my colleagues to join me in standing up for decency and ending the use of our phone system to spread pornography.

OMNIBUS RECONCILIATION BILL

(Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the omnibus reconciliation bill of 1985 will come before us again today. It is now in a form that everyone, including the White House, can accept. The expensive add-ons which would have made it a spending rather than a savings bill have been eliminated; the controversial Superfund provisions are gone and other complicated decisions involving the Outer Continental Shelf, Medicare, expansion of aid to family with dependent children, Federal employee health benefits, all appear to have been resolved.

It is time to move ahead to insure that Government gets the $25 billion in deficit reductions over the next 3 years which does remain in the bill and that the States get their share of OCS revenues.

It is not a bill that any of us will love, but it is a bill that most of us could support. If we continue tickering I believe we will lose the chance to save that $25 billion which we desperately need to achieve our deficit savings this year.

I ask for your full support in the motion to concur which will follow.

SUBSTITUTE TO BE OFFERED FOR H.R. 4332

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, just to digress a little bit from the previous topics, I wish to first thank all the Members of this body who signed the discharge petition No. 4 which was successful last week.

I also wish to announce to the House that when the Judiciary Committee bill, H.R. 4332, comes up Thursday and Friday that I will be offering a substitute for that bill, which basically is patterned after H.R. 945, not S. 49, and that there will be some modifications to it to address some of the concerns of law enforcement officials.

I will be going to the Committee on Rules tomorrow, along with the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to have the opportunity to offer that substitute to the Judiciary Committee bill, hopefully on Thursday.

CHANGING AIR FORCE TRAINERS CAN SAVE $5 BILLION OVER 5 YEARS

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the administration's defense budget isn't going to fly as it was proposed. We are going to have to come up with major savings in that area if we hope to have any chance of complying with the Gramm-Rudman targets. One move to save money is to scrap the T-46A training aircraft contract and, instead, get on with modifying the existing T-37 fleet to do the job.

The Congressional Budget Office says making that change would save $2 billion over the next 5 years, and in this budget battle, that is a savings we can't afford to pass by. I have heard voice after voice on this floor talk about how we need to be achieving savings in the defense portion of the budget through efficiency and economies that do not lessen our security. Changing this trainer contract can do just that. I urge my colleagues to join me in making this possible savings into a reality.

On this one, budgetary realities and sound defense policy argue for the same commonsense policy. We should make sure that the change—and the savings—become reality.

VOTE "YES" FOR AID TO CONTRAS IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, Cubans fighting Israelis on the Syrian front sounds strange and unlikely when discussing the vote on Nicaragua.

Last week President Reagan sent a trained diplomat, Philip Habib, to Central America, while the Soviet empire sent a trained colonial general, Nestor Lopez, to the same region. The contrast between the American and Communist approach could not be more dramatic.

As a member of the Cuban Communist Central Committee, General Lopez has now been assigned to his third colonial war as commander of the Cuban Army in Nicaragua. After being trained in the Soviet Union, he commanded the Cuban armored regiment which fought against Israel on the Syrian front during the 1973 Yom Kippur war. After that debacle, he commanded a Cuban division during the Communist victory in the Angolan civil war.

General Lopez's new role illustrates the fundamental argument between those who see Nicaragua within the context of the Soviet empire's global strategy, and those who see Nicaragua as an isolated issue and local problem. His selection symbolizes the Cuban role as a colonial army and police force for the Soviet empire.

When the Soviet Union realized that Syria was no match for Israel during the Yom Kippur war, they decided to fly in Cuban troops to help out. To supplement Cuban helicopter and Mig fighter pilots, Nestor Lopez was placed in charge of a Cuban tank regiment. Israel soon was faced with the prospect of an unending supply of Cuban and Soviet forces.

The Cuban role in the Yom Kippur war was the first in a series of attempts, many successful, to help the Soviet empire expand. Given the historical role Cuba has played in Third World conflicts, it is clear that Nicaragua could become another Soviet ally in formenting revolution in Central and South America, and potentially in the Middle East.

We believe that voting against the freedom fighters in Nicaragua will make General Lopez's job easier. If he is to succeed, it is entirely plausible that Nicaraguans will soon be helping their brothers in arms in Libya and Iran to achieve their stated goal of defeating Israel.

We believe that Nicaragua, if unchallenged, could pose a serious threat to America and Israel. General Lopez has led enough fights for Communism against Israel in the Middle East and against the forces of freedom in Angola. We are prepared to debate any supporters of Israel who believe that Cuba and Nicaragua do not pose a threat to Israel.

It is time that we send a signal that stops the Soviet empire from building another colony to enforce their suppression of freedom. We urge you to vote yes for aid to the Contras in Nicaragua.

McCARTHY-TYPE TACTICS IN A POLITICAL CAMPAIGN

(Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, a foul, stinking odor has already been injected into the political campaigns.

NCPAC and its surrogates are the source of that odor. Through smear, innuendo, and McCarthy-like statements—they have had the temerity to question the patriotism of some of us in the Congress who oppose Reagan's misguided attempts to pump more American dollars into Contra aid. I am proud to say that I am one who vehemently opposes this latest administration blunder in international affairs.

I am outraged that these latter days McCarthyites have attacked my colleague, MICHAEL BARNES, one of the finest Representatives to ever serve in this House.

I am even more outraged that some Members of this House have embraced this McCarthy tactic of smear and discredit, lie and distortion. There is no reason for any Member of this honorable House to stoop to a dishonorable level. There is no justification for any Member of this House to use the fascist, McCarthy-type tactics in a political campaign. Any Member of this House who resorts to such tactics stains himself or herself with the filthy ooze of demagoguery.

For those who had taken up the McCarthy banner, I can only paraphrase the words of Mr. Welch uttered during the McCarthy hearings. I can only ask of them, as Mr. Welch asked of McCarthy: At long last is there no decency left in you?

WE MUST BREAK THE CYCLE OF POVERTY

(Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think we've all heard the news that in this great land there will be 1 million millionaires by the end of this year. At the same time, we have a nation in which some 40 percent of our children are living in poverty; 40 percent, my fellow Members. Millions and millions of young lives being damaged every day by need. We should be looking, searching, demanding ways to break the cycle of poverty for these youngsters; real, honest ways to build their futures.

Presently in this House we are not looking for ways to improve this situation. We are not addressing these very real problems head on. A warning must be sounded; these problems will not go away. These millions of children will grow up in poverty and the cycle will continue into the future.

We need to agree as a body of lawmakers that we must turn this tide around and create opportunities for these children. We must search, we must think. As a body, we must create new ways and find new solutions to stop the cycle of ongoing poverty. We can no longer afford to sit on our laurels and simply ignore the fact that 40 percent of this Nation's children are suffering need, and that they will live and grow in poverty. It is up to us. We must have the courage and the commitment to change this now. Without this commitment, the Nation will lose whatever gifts these young children could have contributed. We cannot afford to turn our backs.

SMALL BUSINESS SET-ASIDE REGULATIONS

(Mr. TORRES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, the President's proposal to eliminate the Small Business Administration has received much publicity, to be sure. Not getting the same attention, and yet just as onerous to small businesses nationwide, is the administration proposal to drastically change the Small Business Set-Aside Program.

Even if you support the President's budget, you should question this OMB proposal to virtually wipe out the set-aside program. Nearly one-half of all prime contract awards that went to small business in fiscal year 1984 were set-aside awards totaling over $15.6 billion.

You cannot protect the Nation from high-priced toilet seats and hammers if small businesses are unable to compete exclusively for Federal contracts. You cannot expect small businesses to generate new jobs and new tax revenues, if they are unable to compete effectively for work with the Nation's largest buyer of goods and services—the Federal Government.

We can stop this OMB proposal by joining me in cosponsoring H.R. 4097, that takes the existing set-aside regulation and translates it into the law of the land.

We can protect the set-aside program from OMB by simply turning a regulation into a statute. I urge you to cosponsor H.R. 4097. I urge you to aid small businesses by helping to reject this proposed regulatory change.

ACID RAIN

(Mr. SCHEUER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the very serious problem of acid rain, our Government has played Nero—fiddling while Rome burns.

President Reagan today has the perfect opportunity to change the administration's policy of footdragging on doing something about acid rain—and also improve our strained relations with Canada over the issue—when he meets with Prime Mininster Mulroney.

For more than 5 years, the administration has insisted that more study is needed to determine the actual causes and effects of acid rain. The administration insists that we have to know everything before we can do anything. But studies by the National Academy of Sciences and others make it perfectly clear that coal-burning utilities, industrial plants, and automobile emissions are the culprits—and that a sensible cost-effective level of emissions controls are the answer.

The acid rain problem is no longer confined to the Northeast and Canada. Evidence suggests that many other regions of our country are affected already or susceptible to acid rain damage.

In an effort to get the ball rolling, I have introduced legislation—H.R. 4129—to implement the recommendatons made by Special Envoy Drew Lewis and his Canadian counterpart.

My bill, which would establish a joint industry-government program to develop and demonstrate new control technology, is not a cure-all, nor a substitute for mandated emissions reduction.

In fact, the legislation is only the bare minimum necessary to begin a meaningful assault on the acid rain problem.

But it is a long overdue first step forward and the President should embrace it.

AID TO NICARAGUA

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I just got back from Nicaragua, and in light of what I saw and heard, I find today's speeches by the left wing of the Democratic Party astonishing.

If you think that the Democratic resistance in Nicaragua can hang on without assistance, you have not been to Managua lately.

If you think that your no vote on Contra aid will not be seen by the Communist government in Nicaragua as a vote supporting them, you have not been to Managua lately.

If you think that the Communist government is not involved in international drug dealing, you have not been to Managua lately.

If you think that the Sandinista Communist government that you encourage with your vote is not involved in massive human rights violations, you have not been to Managua lately.

If you think that the church is not directly threatened with not only persecution in Nicaragua, but outright extinction in Nicaragua, you have not been to Managua lately.

The situation in Nicaragua is appalling. The Democratic resistance is the Nicaraguan peoples' last hope to throw off the shackles of Communist tyranny.

For Members of Congress to stand safely on this floor and take potshots at men and women of tremendous courage who are struggling against great odds to oppose Communist tyranny in Nicaragua is, indeed, astonishing. That questions no one's patriotism; it questions their judgment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I request the gentleman's words be taken down. He is questioning the judgment of other Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAY of Illinois). The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL] requests that the words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] be taken down. The Chair would inquire as to which words the gentleman refers to.

Mr. MITCHELL. He questions the judgment of the Members of the House who oppose the Reagan proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman did not refer to any specific Member in violation of the rules of the House. Does the gentleman insist on his request?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do because it followed a statement that I just made where I indicated that I oppose the President's position, and certainly by inference he is questioning my judgment and I resent it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman insists, and the Clerk will report the words.

□ 1310

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Speaker so desires, I will not press the point of order, but with the indulgence of the Speaker, I will state that I personally resent any attempt to impugn my motives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withdraws his demand.

THE PRESIDENT NEEDS TO UNDERSTAND THE FRUSTRATION AND PAIN OF THE COUNTRY'S FARMERS

(Mr. WOLPE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the House Budget Committee traveled to Worthington, MN, to take testimony from farmers of that community with respect to the current agricultural situation and the impact of the budget proposals that are pending before the Congress.

Three days later, I had a town meeting in my own district in Michigan with farmers from Calhoun County.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that the President of the United States could have been present at these two meetings. I wish he could have been present so he could understand the enormous pain, the hurt that is being felt within agricultural communities throughout the Midwest. To see these farmers, in the course of these sessions, break down in tears as they tried to capture their sense of frustration and despair is a very difficult experience.

I do not know what it will take to get Mr. Reagan to understand that when he talks about the budget in abstrct terms that there are people behind those numbers, behind those statistics. I do not know what it will take for Mr. Reagan to begin to understand that when he threatens to veto the Commodity Credit Corporation legislation that is so vitally needed so farmers can get the funds they require to get about this planting season, that he is causing real pain and is threatening the lives and livelihoods of literally thousands upon thousands of families throughout this country.

Mr. President, please understand what is happening out there. Please respond in a helpful way.

NO CONNECTION BETWEEN SOMOZA AND THE CONTRAS

(Mr. HUNTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I heard the Democrat deputy whip speaking of his perceived connection between Mr. Somoza and the Contras, and I am reminded of a story that is told by the Human Rights Commission in Nicaragua about a cabdriver named Nelson Perez, who made the terrible mistake of booing Commandante Arce at a cabdrivers' union meeting; the last public act that he ever made.

That night he was arrested by the Sandinistas and a short time later his widow was told that he had been killed, unfortunately, while trying to escape.

I think there is a strong connection between many leaders in Nicaragua and Mr. Somoza, but I think that that connection lies much stronger between the nine commandantes and their actions, particularly with regard to the prison system, particularly El Chipote Prison and Mr. Somoza.

There is a connection, but the connection is with the commandantes and Somoza, not with the freedom fighters and Somoza.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. May we please have order in the galleries.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE'S USE OF THEIR EXTRA $100 MILLION

(Mr. OWENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, at a time when Head Start, aid for the elderly, and a number of other very worthwhile programs are being cut by the Gramm-Rudman formula, I was shocked to find that the Defense Department has $100 million of the taxpayers' money lying around that they could make available as a gift to the Contras in Nicaragua.

If the Defense Department insists on making this gift available to the Western Hemisphere, I think there are much better uses that we could put this money to.

For example, the economy of Haiti, which has been a loyal client state for the United States for years; that economy is a basket case now, and with the departure of the dictator, Duvalier, I hope that better things are in the works.

We should appropriate some part of that $100 million for the Haitian economy.

The economy of Grenada is in a shambles; unemployment is already above 25 percent, and now that the airport has been completed in Grenada, it is likely to rise higher. I would like to see some portion of that $100 million appropriated for the economy of Grenada. The Caribbean Basin Initiative, which the President pushed so hard 3 years ago is in a shambles. None of the countries seem to be receiving any significant aid from the CBI.

I would like some portion of that $100 million to be devoted to the task of helping those countries which are our allies and are part of the Caribbean Basin Initiative Program.

One hundred million dollars is a lot of money, and I think it can be put to much better use, to help the countries in the Western Hemisphere to promote peace and progress.

PRESIDENT REAGAN MAKES THE CONTRAS A PARTISAN ISSUE

(Mr. AuCOIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday night, President Reagan took his campaign for the Contras into America's living rooms. Castigating the Sandinistas, the President called for understanding here at home and said that aid to the Contras, quote: "is not some narrow partisan issue, but rather is an issue on which we must act mutually as Americans."

Well, Mr. Speaker, last week the President's men carried a different message to me. A television crew from my Oregon district got an unexpected invitiation from the White House to come down and interview Mr. Patrick Buchanan, the communications director, on the administration's position on Nicaragua.

During that interview and without prodding, Buchanan brought up my name as one who, in his words, "knowingly or not" was acting as an ally of the Communists. Because I am a Democrat who disagrees, I was singled out for a partisan attack by Mr. Buchanan. He impugned my loyalty as an American and made an obvious attempt to silence my opposition to these misbegotten policies of his administration.

Mr. Speaker, based on telephone calls that are coming in to my office in Oregon, it is clear to me that most Oregonians simply cannot understand why Mr. Reagan wants to spend $10,000 per Contra when Oregon school districts are running out of funds. Oregonians do not understand "humanitarian" aid when there is not enough money for veterans hospitals and for day care in our State.

And, Mr. Speaker, not one of those Oregonians I have just mentioned think that they are in any way working for the KGB or for the Russians; but I think they do wonder, as do I, why Ronald Reagan says he is for free speech and democracy in Nicaragua when his henchmen try to stifle free speech here on the floor of the Congress of the United States.

THE JUANITA CRAFT POST OFFICE OF SOUTH DALLAS

(Mr. BRYANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because Juanita Jewel Craft never sought recognition or glory for herself that she even more richly deserves the honor we seek to give her today by asking our colleagues in the Senate to join us in naming the South Dallas Post Office "the Juanita Craft Post Office of South Dallas."

She knew well that there is no limit to the good that one can accomplish if he or she doesn't care who gets the credit.

It was never credit that she sought. Quite the opposite.

Juanita Craft saw a society divided and her calling to unite it.

She saw a people relegated to second-class status and said it shouldn't be.

When Juanita Craft was 16, her mother was denied, because of her race, the medical treatment that might have saved her life and told her daughter, "I am suffering for somebody else."

"And I wondered if she was suffering for me," Mrs. Craft said. "I felt like I owed it to her, my people, and civilization to break up segregation wherever I found it. It's an ugly thing and everybody should be opposed to it."

Born on February 9, 1902, in Round Rock, TX, Juanita Craft was, for almost 60 years until her death at 83 last August, a beacon lighting the way toward equality and justice throughout her city, her State, and her Nation.

Few people have equaled Juanita Craft's bedrock contributions to her society. Her legacy is not only in the successes she achieved for all of us in the areas of human rights, voting rights, and the right to proportional representation, but also the final example she set that persistent dedication and diligence in pursuit of a worthy cause can work miracles.

As Dallas NAACP Chairman Ted Watkins observed, "Lots of people were afraid, but, when she led, you followed."

Juanita Craft never lost sight of the purposes that drove her to lead and that established her as a symbol of the struggle for equality. "Don't call me a color," she said, "Call me a human being."

She never lost the sense of humor that buoyed her spirits and those of her followers and coworkers. And she never lost the compelling energy that inspired those of us many years younger.

Mother of the civil rights movement in Texas, leader of the NAACP on whose national board she served, Democratic precinct chair for 23 years, Dallas City Council member from 1975 through 1979, winner of the Linz Award for community service, Juanita Craft was an extraordinary person.

She was the soul of strength, compassion, and unselfishness who will live on in the countless lives hers enriched and will continue to enrich through her contributions to education, equality, and opportunity.

Nothing says more of this giant of a woman than her own words: "I have no children. I have adopted the world."

The world is richer for her passage through it, and I thank you for joining with me in observing that passage by approving H.R. 3331 to establish the Juanita Craft Post Office of South Dallas in loving tribute to a beloved woman.

A PLASTIC GUN SHOWS UP AT NATIONAL AIRPORT—CONGRESS MUST ACT NOW TO MAKE THEM ILLEGAL

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, last night a man was arrested in National Airport. What distinguished this arrest from the many other arrests that are effected in that area was that this man was carrying two weapons in a carryon piece of luggage.

When the police opened the luggage, after seeing the x-ray, they found not one gun, but two guns. What makes the difference and the point of this comment is that one of those guns, which was undetected in the x-ray, was a Glock 17, manufactured in Austria, for the most part made of plastic, with some small portions of it metal.

That was not revealed on the x-ray. This is the type of weapon that we must be concerned about, and is ideally suited for terrorist activities.

In America, there is an American manufacturer who has produced an entire weapon of plastic. I introduced legislation last week that would make the importation, manufacture, and sale of these weapons illegal. We call this type of weapon a "Qadhafi special" because it is rumored that he has purchased 300 already and is the type of firearm ideally suited for terrorist activities because of their ability to avoid detection.

I am urging the Members of the House to support the legislation, but more than that, to effectively focus on the nature of the weapons that are being produced today.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S OBJECTIVES ARE CLEAR: FORCEFUL OVERTHROW OF THE SANDINISTA GOVERNMENT

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the key to resolving any thorny problem is to be clear about objectives, and the more I have heard from the President and Mr. Buchanan, the clearer it is: Their objective is the forceful overthrow of the Sandinista government.

There is no other logical conclusion from the administration's claims about how defenseless all the rest of Central America and U.S. borders would be against a Sandinista-sponsored tide.

Pursuing their basic objectives, the administration has been willing to ally itself with anyone, including former Somocistas. Yesterday, the administration acknowledged that the commander of the FTN Air Force is a former personal pilot for Somoza, and a captain in his dreaded national guard, one Juan Gomez.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there are alternative ways to safeguard democracy in Central America, and there are far better alternatives than to align ourselves with former associates of the former dictator of Nicaragua.

A COCAINE SALE TO FINANCE THE CONTRAS?

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, there is an article that was written in the San Francisco Examiner that basically states that the biggest cocaine seizure in west coast history had been effected in 1983, and supposedly, it was going to help finance the freedom-fighting patriots known as the Contras.

Four hundred and ninety pounds of cocaine, ladies and gentlemen, that was going to be sold to your children to help this struggling nation to overcome its problems with this Marxist regime.

I am specifically saying today that I would like to go a step further; and as a young congressman, I do not know what leeway I have, but I am going to ask the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control to assist them to investigate two things:

□ 1320

No. 1, why did that U.S. attorney return $36,000 to those dope-dealing creeps? And No. 2, did the CIA know about this, according to documents now published? And if they did, did they turn their back and should America be investigating a bunch of dope-dealing patriots, not freedom-fighting patriots in Central America?

Thank you.

MR. PRESIDENT, YOU BELIEVE IN LIBERTY, THE CONTRAS DO NOT

(Mr. WHEAT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. President, in your misguided zeal to win American support for the Contras in Nicaragua you have portrayed them as the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers. Indeed you have recently revealed the startling news that you are a Contra, too.

Given their recruiting problems, the Contras must be ecstatic over your enlistment. Nonetheless our Founding Fathers did not share the Contras' taste for rape, mutilation, and murder. The Contras are in fact dominated by ex-Somocistas who butchered their countrymen for decades. Second in command is your new comrade, Walter Tonio Calderon, a loyal Somoza man. He and his palace guards defended Somoza's private quarters to the bitter end.

Today wearing his new Contra uniform he carries on the tradition of the Somocistas, a tradition of violence and terror against innocent Nicaraguan civilians.

Mr. President, let's stop this charade; you are not a Contra, you truly do believe in liberty, the Contras do not.

Let us not give American aid to the Contras; they do not deserve it.

IN SUPPORT OF THE CLEVELAND STATE VIKINGS

(Mr. STOKES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize the "Cinderella team" of the 1986 NCAA Basketball Tournament, the Vikings of Cleveland State University, from Cleveland, OH, my city.

In the March 11, 1986, Washington Post, Tony Kornheiser began his comments on the Cleveland State team with these words: "Speaking of teams with a limited shelf life, let me acquaint you with some of the NCAA's more perishable selections * * *. We have the Cleveland State Vikings and the Brown Bruins (the teams could merge, producing the Cleveland State Browns) * * * 'Goodnight, Gracie, to all of them.' "

Well, not so fast Gracie. And Tony Kornheiser, you'd better take another look too. The team from Cleveland is still very much alive in the NCAA, having defeated Bobby Knight and his Indiana Hoosiers and a great team from St. Joseph's and will be facing Navy in a third round game on Friday in New Jersey.

Indeed, as Bill Nichols of the Cleveland Plain Dealer has put it, "Cleveland State is still very much alive in the east regional of the NCAA tournament, despite the predictions of some naysayers." Today, all the experts are saying that they knew all along that Cleveland State was a fine team and most say they were not surprised by the 83-79 upset over Indiana on Friday or the 75-69 win over St. Joseph's on Sunday.

The Cleveland State team members can be proud of their play in the NCAA tournament so far. Clinton Ransey, scoring 27 points, including 11 in the final 10 minutes, gave a virtual basketball clinic in the Indiana game.

Eddie Byrant, after playing about as well as anyone his size can play, in the St. Joseph's game, was more nervous at a press conference than during the game. Clinton Smith and the other players—Mudd, McFadden, Crawford, Stewart, Hood, Corbin, and Salters are all to be congratulated for their fine play.

My congratulations, of course, go to the Cleveland State Coach Kevin Mackey and to President Walter B. Waetjen and his fine administration who have provided the support necessary to bring such a high quality team to Cleveland.

This team, like the city they represent, is not to be underestimated. They have made Cleveland proud and we are proud of them.

THE STATUE OF LIBERTY

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of 35 people who work at Springfield Dodge in my home State of Illinois. These folks sent a letter to the President recently, to protest the firing of Lee Iacocca as chairman of the Statue of Liberty restoration.

My constituents at Springfield Dodge have every right to be concerned, and they deserve an explanation.

In his response, I hope the President will offer a good reason why Mr. Iacocca was relieved of his duties. Was he incompetent? Unsuitable for the job? Unreliable? Or was he simply doing such a good job that the administration got worried that Mr. Iacocca would upstage them in restoring and revitalizing this national monument?

And second, now that Mr. Iacocca is no longer entrusted with this responsibility, my constituents deserve to know the future of the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island. Will it remain a traditional monument of welcome to Americans who have made their way here from every corner of the world? Or does this administration have in mind a change in Statue of Liberty's famous motto, from "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free," to "Give me you real estate developers, your investors, your yuppies yearning for a luxury resort?"

Mr. Speaker, my constituents at Springfield Dodge deserve an answer, Mr. Iacocca deserves an answer, and the American people deserve an answer. I hope the President will give them one.

OPPOSING THE ARMS SALE TO SAUDI ARABIA

(Mr. MANTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to reject the administration's proposed $350 million arms sale to Saudi Arabia. This sale would reward a nation which has failed to support our goal of peace and stability in the Middle East and would further jeopardize Israel's right to exist.

In the past, Congress has stated that any arm sales to Saudi Arabia should occur only after the Saudis promote our goals of peace and stability in the region. However, rather than encouraging the peace process, Saudi Arabia is still in a state of war with Israel. Saudi Arabia has actively discouraged other nations from seeking a normalization of their relations with Israel, and continues to provide funds for the terrorist activities of the PLO.

Furthermore, in recent years more and more American citizens have been the tragic victims of terrorist actions. Rather than supporting United States efforts to curb world terrorism, the Saudis continue to support those who are responsible for American deaths. In fact, they have offered to counteract the effects of our sanctions against Libya.

Mr. Speaker, Saudi Arabia has a sufficient arsenal to counter any military threats from Iran. In fact, the United States has already sold the Saudis more than $40 billion in weapons. It would be against our Nation's interests to escalate the arms race in the Middle East and reward a nation whose actions undermine United States efforts toward peace. I urge my colleagues to join me in rejecting the administration's proposal.

THE TIME TO STOP TESTING OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IS NOW

(Mr. DOWNEY of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, there is an administration-leaked story in today's New York Times about the resumption of nuclear weapon testing that proves that when it comes to arms control the administration's world is upside down.

Our Government has not tested nuclear weapons since late last year. Apparently, according to the article, to "keep the atmosphere conducive for a favorable Soviet response."

Response to what?

It is the Soviet Union that has declared a moratorium on testing and the Reagan administration has responded by inviting Soviet scientists to watch a United States test and begin calibrating test equipment so that the threshold Test Ban and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty can be ratified.

The Soviet Union is offering us the bakery and the administration is requesting "half-a-loaf."

We live in a world with 50,000 plus nuclear weapons. More are not needed. The United States currently has an advantage in yield to weight ratio's on its warheads and in miniaturization. It is in the United States interest to prevent the Soviets from testing again. We can stop their tests by stopping ours. We can prevent a Soviet propaganda coup by acting in our interest.

The Reagan administration even has an offer to have the tests monitored in both the United States and U.S.S.R. by six countries who want to help the superpowers to end the arms race.

All the obstacles, adequate verifications on site inspections have been removed. The time to act is now.

CONTRA CAPT. ARMANDO "EL POLICIA" LOPEZ

(Mr. MARKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, if Congress approves $100 million in aid to the Contras, the assistance will be disbursed by Capt. Armando Lopez, a cofounder of the Contra. As the Contras' commander of logistics, Lopez orders all military and logistical supplies for combat units, and controls distribution of materiel.

Lopez is known by his nickname, "El Policia," which we all know means, "The Policeman." But Lopez is not your friendly cop on the beat. During the Somoza dictatorship, he served as Managua's chief of police—the same police force which used to arrest, torture, and assassinate civilian political opponents during the 1970's.

Today "El Policia" is using those old skills on behalf of the FDN.

But we need not worry, the President assures us, because the Contra seeks only to force the Sandinistas to negotiate. But "El Policia" has a different notion of his role—and I quote: "We'll fight this war to the finish if we have to use picks and shovels. We won't hold peace talks * * *."

Mr. Speaker, if we vote to spend millions more on these Contras, we will be repeating the mistakes of the past—backing Somoza's national guardsmen, and pursuing a foreign policy down the slippery slope to more direct military involvement.

FREEDOM FIGHTERS ARE SOMOCISTAS (WOLVES) IN CONTRAS' (SHEEP'S) CLOTHING

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, when the President said that he too is a Contra, once again his comrades in arms and his commanders include Josito Pino Perez. Before his reincarnation as a freedom fighter, Pino Perez was a national guard captain who assisted Somoza's son in commanding the guard's infantry training school. According to the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency Perez began his freedom-fighting career as a persecutor in the FDN, 15th of September Legion. In 1981 and 1982 Perez led a small group of former guardsmen on such noble missions as bombing the Nicaraguan civilian airliner in Mexico City, hijacking the Costa Rican airliner in San Jose, and sending a suitcase bomb to a Honduras civilian airliner that exploded in the civilian area of Sandino Airport in Managua. Surely our President cannot be a member of these Contra forces.

But let me say what my colleagues and others have said here today on the question of who are the Contras: Last week Congressmen MCHUGH and myself released a report that pointed out that 12 out of the 13 commanders of the Contras' high command are former officers in Somoza's national guard. These are the people who would receive, distribute, and benefit from military aid requested by the President of the United States from this Congress. We must turn down the request. Following the release of our report the State Department has provided us with the names of the FDN senior personnel. The State Department confirms that 9 of the 13 names that we have mentioned are former members of the Somocistas.

THE FRIGHTENING SIMILARITIES BETWEEN VIETNAM AND NICARAGUA

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, a group of eight Congressmen had an opportunity last month to travel to Hanoi to reach out to the Communist government in power over all of Indochina, what used to be called Indochina, for our missing-in-action Americans.

The scene in Hanoi was depressing indeed, utter economic decay which always results from communism. I had the opportunity Friday to visit Managua, Nicaragua, with eight other Congressmen, one of us DAVE DREIER, had also been with me in Hanoi just 4 weeks to the day before.

We could see the analogies, the similarities between the economic decay in Managua and also in Hanoi.

The frightening thing is that Vietnam has a population of over 42 million people and they have about 11,000 political prisoners, 11,000 left over from 11 years ago when communism triumphed.

In Nicaragua, a country of only 2½ million people, and there are about a half million up here already as exiles, there are already 11,000 political prisoners in 9 camps, clandestinely built. That is the only thing they are building in the country. Many of them are in solitary confinement; torture and capital punishment is used although it is ostensibly against the law in Nicaragua.

I beg every Member to look at the American intelligence imagery by satellite or by aircraft; look at the pictures of these prison camps and know tomorrow that we are sealing the fate of 11,000 to 13,000 people if we do not help the Contras, the freedom fighters in Central America.

AN OUTSTANDING SPEECH, BUT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE ARE LISTENING TO THE MESSAGE, NOT THE MESSENGER

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday night the President took to the airwaves and, as usual, gave a tour de force. His speech was an outstanding speech. But unfortunately for the President, the American people are listening to the message, not the messenger. As I canvassed my colleagues this morning on the floor of the House, Members from every part of the country reported that calls into their district offices were running 2 to 1, 3 to 1, 4 to 1, as much as 10 to 1 against aid.

The American people are focusing not on the messenger but on the message. Let us hope that aid to the Contras is defeated.

THE SANDINISTAS WILL NOT ACCEPT NEGOTIATION NOW

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, there is a question as to whether we should be negotiating further with the Sandinistas or assisting with military supplies to Contras directly. Let me call their attention to a 16-month period between June 1984 and October 1985. We had 16 months to negotiate with the Nicaraguan Communists. We held many meetings, both direct and with Contadora. During that period no American assistance—either humanitarian or military—was given to the Contras. During that period the Sandinistas further repressed their people, stepped up their military buildup from the Soviets and continued to create a Communist-totalitarian mayhem closer to the Rio Grande than that river is to Washington, DC.

There has been a record of negotiations during a period when there has been an aid cutoff. Why in the world should the Sandinista Communists accept our offers now without any decent U.S. bargaining position. Why should they when for 16 months they did not accept those offers and we did not do a darned thing except come back and ask for more negotiations?

THE PRESIDENT IS NOT A CONTRA

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States declared himself a Contra last Friday. As the leader of the free world for the past 5 years, the President wears many different hats and is many different things to many different people. But a Contra?

Mr. Speaker, the President enjoys great popularity in his country and is loved and revered by many, respected and admired by most. The Contras do not enjoy great popularity in their country, are loved and respected by very few and are revered by almost no one.

The President was elected twice by the people of his country to serve with a solid foundation of electoral and popular support. His legitimate claim to his office is questioned by no one. The Contras are the creation of the Central Intelligence Agency led by people whose democratic allegiance is highly suspect and whose legitimacy is questioned by every nation in the Western Hemisphere save those bastions of democracy and freedom, Paraguay and Chile.

The President certainly does not engage in the systematic brutalization of his fellow countrymen and abduct, torture, maim, disfigure, and finally murder innocent men, women, and children. The Contras terrorize the citizens of Nicaragua and kidnap families, slash off their limbs, gouge out their eyes, cut off their genitals, and finally slit their throats.

No, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is not a Contra. The people of this Nation would not continue to support him if he was.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] will be recognized for 30 mintues.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewomen from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRADISON].

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, as 1986 unfolds, the veil is being stripped away from congressional consideration of the budget process. And it is becoming increasingly clear that the talk about deficit reduction is mostly talk—and not much else. With the lower court finding that the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings automatic trigger is unconstitutional, that landmark attempt to reduce the deficit looks more and more like a toothless tiger. Last week, the House was offered a chance to vote on the President's budget, but was not even permitted to consider alternatives. Bashing the President's budget has become a popular parlor game; but it doesn't bring us one step closer to deficit reduction.

Finally, today, Mr. Speaker, comes the last straw. Almost halfway through the current fiscal year, Congress still has not acted on the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, the legislation needed to implement spending cuts for the current year. The Congress broke up in disagreement over this bill in December and here we are in mid-March still trying to find a satisfactory compromise.

The latest version sent to us by the other body deserves our support. Listen carefully and you will find that the principal complaint about the Senate version is not that it saves too little, but that it saves too much. And no wonder. The House version would put on the books costly new programs which would not likely become law if they had to stand on their own.

The gentlelady from Illinois has offered a preferential motion to vote on the Senate-passed bill in its entirety before there is an opportunity to take up amendments. There will be no clearer vote on spending cuts this year. I urge my colleagues to support this essential deficit-reducing proposal.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion to concur.

When the House acted on March 6 to amend the reconciliation package, it did so in good faith and in recognition of the need to compromise on items in dispute in order to resolve the deficit reduction agreements of last year.

I must oppose the motion to concur because I do not believe the other body's action was taken in good faith. In the face of the clearly articulated position of the House, the other body, in its amendment, deleted crucial modifications of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, Medicare, AFDC, and the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program. Beyond that, the other body went so far as to include in its amendment changes in the Medicare Program which will benefit a single constituency in a single State.

Reconciliation was intended to be a vehicle for deficit reduction. The House has acted to fulfill that pledge in good faith. Our foremost duty as legislators is to promote policies which will benefit all of America. We must not feel pressured to accept what we may feel is bad public policy, simply because a package "would be acceptable to the administration—a major concession" or "the President will sign this package."

The House has worked its will. We have negotiated. We have compromised.

We must not agree to concur in the Senate's action.

□ 1345

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], the Republican whip.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the preferential motion. It was dispensed with, but I think it tells the story.

The gentlewoman from Illinois "moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H.R. 3128, with the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment thereto, and to concur in the Senate amendment."

How thin are we going to slice this baloney? It is time that we act on reconciliation.

Let me read to the Members some remarks that were most effectively delivered last week on the reconciliation bill.

Mr. Speaker, this is the acid test. This is the time. The time for talk really has passed. Now it is the time for action. This is an opportunity to save $18 billion—

Maybe it is only $13 billion, but maybe $18 billion—

"off the deficits of the next 3 years.

The question we face is really a fairly simple one. Do we make good on the pledge that we made in the budget resolution that passed last year so overwhelmingly or will we renege on that pledge?

This is the only opportunity we will have to make good on that pledge and this is a fine vehicle on which to do it. It represents that best compromise that was possible.

When we passed the budget, we actually signed a promissory note to the effect that we were going to make certain savings on further budgets.

Now, here is our opportunity to sign the check that pays off that promissory note. Do we sign the check and redeem the note or do we say, "Well, no, let's put that on a credit card" and let's go over to another day.

Now is the time, now is the opportunity.

Those are parts of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, the distinguished majority leader. There were other remarks here, very good; I agreed with them then, and I think they are applicable now.

Now is the time for us to fulfill that promissory note.

But let us talk about the procedure we are going through here. The gentlewoman has moved that we concur with the Senate amendments. I presume later on there will be a motion to table that motion to concur. And after that, if the motion to table should pass, somebody on that side will move that we disagree with the Senate. And after that there will be, perhaps by our side, a motion to go to conference.

Where does this end? And we are not now arguing over dollars and cents. In many instances, a lot of it is policy decisions.

If you are from a tobacco-producing State, are you not worried about the fact that there has been a tobacco agreement and yet we continue to string out on and on and on this effort to get an agreement on reconciliation? It is costing us at least $7 million a day. But there has been an agreement on tobacco. Whether you are a Democrat or a Republican, whether you are from a tobacco-producing State, or even if you are not, you ought to be interested in that tobacco agreement.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. On the subject of tobacco?

Mr. STARK. Yes.

Mr. LOTT. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. STARK. I think it is important. Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI has a primary in Illinois today and he has asked me to indicate to his colleagues that it is his intention to introduce a concurrent resolution making the tobacco tax provision retroactive should the Senate accept the bill we have returned to them, and I think it is important that that be noted at this point in the debate.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for that information. I think it may not be quite so simple, because we have caused some problems for States, and I am not sure we can just go back and reverse the situation.

Obviously, when we do agree or if we never can agree, we need to do something more on tobacco, but I am emphasizing to my colleagues here that this issue is still up in the air and we breached the deadline last Friday.

Now, also, on the question of 8(g), the Outer Continental Shelf revenues, there has been a very difficult, very closely worked out compromise to resolve that issue, one that many States like Texas, Louisiana, California, Mississippi, we would like to get that thing on through. But how long are we going to keep pitching it back and forth. And what dark hole are we going to send this to? Are we just going to say "Hey, we disagree" again and just kind of leave it up in the air? Is there to be no conference? What happens?

We have a bird in the hand here. Are we serious about reconciliation or not? Do we want the $13 billion savings, or $18 billion if you go by the CBO numbers, but at least maybe $13 billion in savings, do we want that or not?

Are you aware that the Senate version is $900 million better in that it reduces the deficit $900 billion more than the House version? I think that we are saying in the House, after all this batting of the ball back and forth, we want it our way or we will not have it at all.

Please, my colleagues, let us be serious in a bipartisan way and let us pass this reconciliation bill, or we may still be here punting this ball back and forth when we get ready for the next reconciliation package.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would just point out to the gentleman that I thought he said $900 billion. I am sure he meant million.

Mr. LOTT. $900 million.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The second thing I would like to ask the gentleman is: Is the gentleman prepared, as a Representative of the great State of Mississippi, to vote for a reconciliation package which is going to penalize the entire health system of Mississippi in order to provide for exemption for one State in the entire Union? When you vote for this bill you will be voting to penalize all the health care systems in Mississippi so that one State that has been exempted by the Senate will be able to benefit. I do not think the gentleman wants to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has again expired.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think any of us know what impact it might have on our States. I do not like some of the changes that have been made. I am for the Buy America provision. I do not particularly like what we have done in the hospital area. But there are a lot of other areas that I am sure the gentleman would take a different position. But how long does this go on back and forth? I think it is time we act. I think it is more important for the people of this country and for the economy of this country that we take action to reduce the deficit, stop losing $7 million a day on the tobacco question, stop prolonging acting to begin to reduce the deficit. Let us take the majority leader's words: Now is the time. Let us draw the line and say it is not perfect but we have got to stop this idiocy at some point and act to pass this reconciliation and send it to the President.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would just simply say to the gentleman that it is my understanding that the $900 million is not the figure. It is more like $200 million to $300 million.

Mr. LOTT. Only $200 million or $300 million? That is not chickenfeed where I come from.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I would point out there are policy changes, though, that are here, such as the one that I mentioned, that penalizes the gentleman's own State, and it is because of those policy issues that I think are fairly significant that are inequitable that provide exemptions for one State as opposed to the other 49 States. I do not think that is good policy. Although this Chair wants to have deficit reduction, and I have been pushing and fighting for reconciliation, I do not think that we ought to pay that kind of price. I do not think Mississippi ought to and I do not think Pennsylvania, Illinois, Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, Texas, or anybody else——

Mr. LOTT. For a policy issue we are going to walk away from $13 billion to $18 billion?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Well, I would point out that the White House has been doing that now ever since December.

Mr. LOTT. The White House is ready to sign this package. Let us pass it and send it to the President and move on to other deficit reduction efforts.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I say the package that we ought to be supporting is a bipartisan package that comes out of the House and the Senate and not the White House.

Mr. LOTT. This is a bipartisan package.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman wants to accept the White House package that exempts that one State.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to vote against the motion to table.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK].

Mr. STARK. I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to step away, if we can, for a moment, between the differences in the Senate bill and what we sent to them and remind my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that we have an institutional position here. I think we may be setting a very bad precedent. As the gentleman from Mississippi sat—and so did I—in the conference meetings for weeks, we had a signed agreement and a conference agreement with the Senate.

What happened in the other body after we agreed in conference, particularly in the areas of Medicare and AFDC, in which we had come to an agreement—these are areas they are not changing, and they are changing without the benefit of a conference. Whichever position you may have taken on the other side of the aisle, you compromised with me and my colleagues on this side of the aisle, and the Senate on both parties compromised with us, and we had a signed conference agreement. My question is, Do we want to change that through this kind of a new procedure where, at the 11th hour, OMB steps in to revise what we have worked so carefully to craft?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Let me make sure I understand what has been done in this DRG area.

The House language would have delayed 1 year the implementation of the Medicare prospective payment system hospitals; is that correct?

Mr. STARK. That is correct.

Mr. LOTT. And the Senate then took that delay out; is that right?

Mr. STARK. The Senate made changes only with respect to Oregon. And they also made a change in the AFDC statements procedures. But what I am suggesting to you, whether they changed it for—you are in for a dime, you are in for a dollar. The point is that OMB was not a party to the conference. They did not sign the conference report.

Mr. LOTT. As I understand it, they deleted the 1-year implementation; is that correct or not?

Mr. STARK. No.

Mr. LOTT. They just exempted Oregon?

Mr. STARK. That is all.

Mr. LOTT. As a matter of fact, I would like for the record to reflect that in my own area, my hospitals have complied with the law and were opposed to the 1-year delay.

Mr. STARK. As were the hospitals in California.

The gentleman from Mississippi and this gentleman from California have no quarrel.

Mr. LOTT. So we were in agreement, but the House did not take the position we supported.

Mr. STARK. We were in complete agreement and we were in agreement on the AFDC procedure and the other procedures. These are now being changed in the Senate unilaterally.

Mr. LOTT. But in a very narrow way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK].

Mr. STARK. The point that I would like to make to the gentleman from Mississippi and my colleagues on the other side of the aisle is that this is a procedure that we have never done before. We have never come back after a conference agreement and had the Senate send us something else without benefit; it is not a partisan issue. It may be a regional issue but——

Mr. LOTT. Will the gentleman yield on the AFDC question?

Mr. STARK. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. LOTT. As a matter of fact, I have a list here of over 20 States that would have to change their AFDC rules if the House bill prevails, including my own State. So here, once again, a large number of States that already have rules dealing with this question of AFDC would have to then change their laws, and they may not want to do that.

Mr. STARK. The gentleman makes a good point. The point is that that was an issue that was debated in the conference. It was agreed to by the Senate and by the House, by Members of both parties, as a compromise on the part of both bodies, and we have not had the opportunity to revisit that. It seems to me—and I make a procedural point, not on each issue—do we want to start? And I think this is a question of preserving the integrity of the House.

Mr. LOTT. If the gentleman will yield, I understand the gentleman; I know how hard he has worked on this, and I quite often feel that frustration about the integrity of the House and being made aware of what is going on. And that is why I was so frustrated, as a matter of fact, as a member of the Rules Committee last week when this reconciliation package was brought before the Rules Committee. I do not think one member of the Rules Committee knew what was in that reconciliation package. The ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget was not aware, the Budget Committee did not act on it, we were scrambling around, saying, "Please, tell us, what are we voting on?" So I understand the gentleman's frustration, but I think we are a little bit too dirty to now demand purity on procedure. I hope that we can bring this thing to a conclusion and get an agreement on a reconciliation bill.

I thank the gentleman for yielding time.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, down home we have a saying: There comes a time when you either fish or cut bait.

It is time to fish or cut bait with this bill. This, to the best of my memory, is the second time we had it up this year. We had it up in December two or three times. Lord knows, we must have voted on this thing five times. It is getting a little silly now to keep playing this game of ping-pong, battling and paddling this bill back and forth between the two bodies.

We have before us today something different. Yes, it is a little bit different than the bill we sent over from the House. That is the way compromises work. But, more importantly, it is a bill that was passed by the other body last week, substantially so. More important than that, it is a bill that will be signed by the President of the United States.

No version we have passed, either the House or the Senate before this one, had that guarantee and that assurance.

There are some people here willing to play chicken. There are some folks here saying, "Well, let us just go one step further, let us see if we cannot get just one more thing we want in here and send it over to the President and see if he will veto it."

My friends, we are playing chicken with a fellow that has not lost a game of chicken yet with this Congress since he has been President. If you think you are going to buffalo him or scare him, then you are looking back over 6 years of frustration thinking you have found something new. That is not going to work. I think you are making a mistake there.

We have a chance to achieve $17 billion in savings by simply passing this bill and sending it straight to the White House. Now, what is the purpose of reconciliation? I have some mistaken notion, evidently, that that is its purpose; to try to come up with the legislative savings to implement the budget resolution we passed, and that I voted for last year, to save $17 billion.

The arguments have degenerated not over the savings of money, we are now arguing over OCS powers to the States; we are arguing over Buy America amendments; we are arguing over AFDC changes; we are arguing over one State having something the other State should not have and Medicare in terms of advancement on the DRG system. None of those, I repeat, none of those have anything to do with saving money. Every single one of those points of contention, all valid, they have all got good reasons behind them, are policy questions.

Those policy questions should never have been in a reconciliation bill to start with; we all know that. Reconciliation was to pass the savings into law of that budget resolution. Not to get off into this kind of a thing. I say to all those people who feel strongly about those policy changes: Bring them to us under the regular procedure of your authorizing committee. We will take those up as you are supposed to take up policy questions on the House floor.

Do not get it mixed up with something in trying to save money. I serve on the Budget Committee. We have got to start writing a budget, and boy, time is running out, to save $40 billion to beat Gramm-Rudman next year. We have not gotten started. Here is 17 that would be a start. This $17 billion would go to that baseline. Let us keep playing around; let us keep playing ping-pong, let us keep laying these policy questions, and mind you, to me, it is like another old saying, that is the tail wagging the dog. Let us let the tail keep wagging the dog, and we are not getting anywhere very fast.

We are not getting anywhere at all. In my State we are vitally interested in the passage of this bill today. We have been struggling for 8 years and two administrations to finally get a just settlement of the offshore money. That is money; that is something that validly ought to be in this bill. That is something that will help the Federal Government reduce its deficits.

Finally it is here. Finally it is here; something everybody can live with. Something the Senate passed. Something that two Senators from my State voted for. Something that the Governor of my State is asking all of us in the House delegation from Louisiana to vote for.

It is finally a resolution of that issue, important to my State, important to the Federal Government. Too important to let the tail wag the dog. Too important to let these policy questions that are valid sit here and delay us from bringing about a resolution of $17 billion in savings for the deficit.

People feel strongly about the Buy America amendment. Let me tell you something: I have sympathy for that. We have got the very people who build those rigs now seeing them built overseas. The people that make the steel for them see the steel made overseas, but you are not going to lose anything by delaying this another month or two and take that up separately because nobody is building oil rigs right now. They are being stacked and sold for 10 cents on the dollar.

Anybody that thinks the Buy America amendment is going to come to the immediate rescue of oil and gas workers in this country, and steelmakers in this country, are just fooling themselves. That is more political rhetoric. There is not a rig being built anywhere. You can buy them right now for 10 cents on the dollar in Lafayette, LA, and I will give you the name and address if you are interested in buying one. There are not going to be any more built.

You look at the question of section 19; I know that is important to California. I understand that; it is a raging controversy there. Let us take that up separately. Do not kill $17 billion in deficit savings. Do not kill this offshore settlement over that.

Let me conclude by saying that I have been called today by OMB and the White House saying that they are going to recommend a veto and it is very likely there will be a veto if you put these policy issues in there that they are opposed to. So you are playing a game of chicken. You are risking a settlement now that we live with. You do have a bill that we can simply pass. You better ask yourself what good reason have you got to try to put the ball in the other court one more time.

I think we have gone as far as we can go. We have got a good bill; we ought to sign it. We ought to pass it today and be done with it.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion to concur and for the purpose of providing some legislative history.

Mr. Speaker, under section 779 of the reconciliation bill pertaining to the general revenue sharing law, the time for local governments or the Secretary of the Treasury to demand corrections of "prior underpayments or overpayments" of their revenue sharing amounts would end March 1, 1986—June 2, 1986 under the last Senate version. After that date, any demands for corrections of payments that have already been made will need to be brought to court.

The Members may want to bring this provision to the attention of their local governments, and I am requesting that the office of revenue sharing send a notice of this change of law with the next scheduled payment, on or about April 5, 1986.

The Members should also be aware that this provision does not change existing law as to "future" payments that are currently scheduled for July and October 1986. The Secretary and local governments will have until September 30, 1987 to demand corrections in overpayments and underpayments, as now provided in section 6702(c) of title 31, United States Code.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, as one of the House conferees on the revenue sharing provision of H.R. 3128, I want to associate myself with the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] in regard to section 14001(a)(4) of the conference agreement. I concur in Mr. WEISS' suggestion that the office of revenue sharing should notify units of local government that claims for prior underpayments must be submitted by June 2, 1986. I also agree with the gentleman that the provisions of current law would govern the deadline for claims of underpayment arising from July 1986 and October 1986 payments.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that we would refuse the motion to concur in the Senate amendment because I think the Senate left out a very important provision of this law. That is section 19 dealing with the OCS Lands Act that was intended to strengthen the role of the Governors and other coastal officials in leasing decisions off the coast of our States.

It requires that the Secretary shall consider the legitimate views of the coastal officials that have been effectively ignored in the past. What we have seen in the history of this program is numerous lawsuits, challenging the Secretary in nearly every coastal State because of inadequate consultation with State officials about the development off their coasts. Most recently we have seen this situation in Alaska.

We have seen suits and moratoriums in California and response to lack of consultation that have delayed the leasing program. We have seen minimal compliance concerning the views of the Governors. In one case we saw the Governor of California's views rejected minutes before the sale was accepted.

We have seen the rights to challenge the Secretary's decisions restricted to arbitrary and capricious tests. Section 19 does not give the Governors a veto, but it does require that there be an equal balancing of the environmental resource development and the development of the offshore oil resources.

This does not change the national interest test, but questions the manner in which these resources shall be weighed against the development of the coast. I think this is one of the most important provisions of the OCS Lands Act, and is important to the States, and is important so that we can get on with the orderly development of our OCS resources.

This was an integral part of the compromise that was reached in the conference committee. The Senators from Louisiana agree to this. The Senator from Idaho agreed to this language. It was agreed to by all of the conferees as a necessary part of the AG settlement. Now we have seen it double-crossed by the Senate.

I think what is important is that we not allow that to happen for the sake of the institution of the House of Representatives. But also section 19 would solve a problem that again has just recently reoccurred in California. I have a letter from Governor Deukmejian who lays out the fact that he says he must note in the Interior's recent decision to go forward with the call for information on lease sale 91 off of northern California, and its announced intent to go forward with the call for a southern California sale, "exhibits a serious disregard for the process as established by the OCS Lands Act as amended. The attorney general of California and I have notified Secretary Hodel that we intend to take whatever legal actions necessary to ensure that the process is properly followed."

As a result of not having a strong section 19, once again we see coastal States going into court seeking to have their rights enforced, delaying the operation of the OCS Lands Act to the detriment of the orderly development of our offshore resources.

I would hope that we would support the motion to table and send this back to the Senate so the agreement that was concurred in by all members of the conference committee be concurred in by this House and with the passage of the Reconciliation Act.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, having worked on reconciliation the last 5 or 6 years, there are two very important lessons that this body must keep in mind when we talk about reconciliation. One is truly savings, how much savings are being achieved?

The second is do we protect the position of the House in the conference, because if we are going to have any leverage in dealing with reconciliation, we simply have to stand by the position of the conferees.

On savings, it is clear that $18.6 billion is saved under either version. There are equivalent savings here, whether we accept the position of the House initially or the position that has been referred back to us from the other body.

The second issue, however, is the one that needs to be focused on. Do we in fact protect the position of the House in the conference? We voted this issue to the other body by a vote of 314 to 86, after careful negotiations. Now what we are dealing with is not a deal in which both Houses sat down and worked out their differences with the President, what we have here is a situation in which the other body with OMB worked out their own deal and now they are saying, "Let's all bend over in order to allow this to pass through."

You cannot deal with reconciliation that way. What happens? Look at what happens. The chairman of the Finance Committee sticks in a special provision that applies to one State only, and it costs $25 million. That is what happens.

Second, negotiations carefully worked out on the OCS issue, on the Buy America issue, thrown out the window because of this kind of a deal.

So I urge the House to look at the real lessons of reconciliation; first, savings; but second, let us protect the position of the conferees in the House if we really want to protect the reconciliation process.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI].

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, included in this reconciliation package before us is a provision to increase by 10 percent the tax on coal in an effort to solve the deficit problem of the black lung trust fund.

Let me remind you that the intent of Congress in establishing a coal tax and creating the black lung trust fund was to remove from the Federal Government the responsibility of paying black lung benefits and place that responsibility on the coal industry. This effort to shift the burden to the coal industry was first started in 1978, and as hard as we have tried, we are still unsuccessful.

The reason for our lack of success has been inaccurate calculations regarding the number of beneficiaries, interest rates, and the tons of coal mined.

All these miscalculations have resulted in a current accumulated trust fund debt of $2.8 billion. The trust fund has had to borrow this money from the Treasury because the fund's income has never been adequate to meet its expenditures.

The black lung provisions included in H.R. 3128 consist of: First, a 10-percent increase in the current tax on coal production; second, a forgiveness to the coal industry of the interest that would otherwise accumulate on the outstanding debt over the next 5 years; and third, a decrease in tax at the beginning of 1996 to the rates that were in effect prior to the last set of rate increases in 1981.

Proponents of this provision have stated that this increase is great enough for the fund to reach solvency by the year 1997 and for the debt to be retired by 2007. However, the Labor Department's estimates, with which I concur, indicate that under this proposal before us today the deficit of the trust fund will be $12 billion by the year 2010 and the trust fund will never reach solvency. It is my understanding that the CBO estimates do not contradict the Department's estimates.

I would urge that my colleagues follow the advice of the Labor Department in considering what must be done so that the trust fund can achieve solvency.

Mr. Speaker, the letter from the Honorable Bill Brock on this issue follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, DC, March 17, 1986.

Hon. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR DAN: I am writing you to correct a misimpression apparently held by some members concerning the effect on the solvency of the Black Lung Trust Fund of provisions in the pending reconciliation bill.

The Administration has agreed to the changes to the Black Lung program incorporated in the current bill as part of an overall reconciliation package. Nevertheless, the changes will not eliminate the solvency problems of the Black Lung Trust Fund.

The Trust Fund has a current accumulated debt of $2.8 billion. This money is owed to the United States, which has loaned it to the Trust Fund at standard Treasury interest rates. The loans were necessary because the Fund's income, which comes from an assessment on coal production, has never been adequate to meet its outlays, despite the intent of Congress that mine operators as a group pay for all Fund expenditures.

The black lung provisions in the most current version of the reconciliation legislation consist of three parts: (1) a 10% increase in the current assessment on coal production; (2) a decrease in those assessments at the beginning of 1996 to the rates that were in effect prior to the last set of rate hikes in 1981; and (3) a forgiveness to the coal industry of the new interest that would otherwise accumulate on their outstanding debt over the next five years.

The proponents of these provisions have stated that such legislation will eliminate the industry's debt to the Treasury. They are wrong. Adoption of these proposals will not halt the continued accumulation of new debt, let alone repay the outstanding debt existing already. As indicated on the attached chart, the Department of Labor estimates that the Trust Fund deficit will exceed $12 billion by the year 2010 under this approach. It is important to note that nothing in the budget estimates on this proposal developed by the Congressional Budget Office, which refer only to the impact on the overall Federal deficit for the next five years, contradicts this unpleasant reality.

We wish to note again that the Administration proposed a legislative solution which would have halted the continued accumulation of new debt by the Trust Fund and restored the Fund to full solvency. That approach called for phased increases in the assessment on coal production.

I would appreciate it if you would include this letter in the record when the House votes to concur in the Senate amendments to the reconciliation bill.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this letter from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM E. BROCK.

[1] In 1989–1990, no advances will be needed from the Treasury. The figures shown for these years are the excess of revenues over outlays (which will reduce the accumulated Fund balance). Advances will resume in 1991.

[4] Between 1986–1990, no interest will be accumulated to the BLDTF because of the forgiveness provision of the legislation.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding.

Let me call attention to section 152-02. This is another reason I think to reject the motion to concur. It has to do with something that may not seem extraordinarily important, but it means a lot to the people who participate in Government health plans. As we know, there are 101 different plans.

What we propose to do is lift the cap so that we can make these plans more competitive. The theory of lifting the cap, which is not an official cap, would be that employees then participate in lower cost programs and the Government contribution would then go down.

We know that in the past the administration and OPM have agreed to this, so we do not understand the rationale of having the Senate reject it.

Now, I hope that once in awhile we can give a break to Government employees. I mean, it is not about time that we try to do something that would lower the out-of-pocket expenses they have? After all, we have agreed for the second consecutive year not to give them any raise. We are RIFing people, cutting back and so on. Why do we not do what is prudent, expedient and expeditious, and release this artificial cap so that we can give employees the opportunity to go into lower cost programs? By doing that, the Government contribution goes down as well. It just does not make a lot of sense not to do that.

I hope that we will reject the motion to concur and protect the integrity of the House.

This is really a battle I think more between the House and OMB. Now, if you think that OMB is a legislative branch, fine; then why do we not just roll over an play dead and not do anything to legislate intelligently.

I think we should not give OMB veto power. They are not a branch of the Government and we really ought to protect our conferees on both sides of the aisle. That is what this debate is all about.

I hope we concur with the budget of the distinguished committee chairman.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. Bosco].

Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Speaker, I believe the issue before us right now is not whether there should be policy considerations in the reconciliation bill. All of us know there are dozens of them, but the issue is, will there be any integrity to the process by which we make these decisions? Thousands of hours have been spent on this bill. I have spent many hundreds myself. Over 30 conference committees have met to iron out the provisions of this bill and yet at the last minute a small handful of people from the other body meeting with those from OMB decided that they could discard most of this and throw it in the trash can.

A good example is what happened to the provision that will provide thousands of jobs for American steelworkers and Americans who work on offshore oil platforms. This is property that is owned by the people of the United States, our offshore oil resources. Only American oil companies can bid on that oil, only American labor can work on those rigs. Only American vessels can carry the oil. The oil may only be sold in America; yet for the most part the oil companies in the biggest job producing section of their business have taken thousands and thousands of jobs overseas in building these enormous offshore oil rigs. Out of the last 13 contracts for building these rigs, 12 have gone to Korea and Japan.

The provisions that would prevent that from happening in the reconciliation bill passed the House and the Senate twice. They passed the conference committee. They had support from both Republicans and Democrats, and yet at the last minute were taken out of the bill.

On behalf of the thousands of people who will get work in the future from these provisions, I ask that we go back once more to the bargaining table. I think we are near the end of the line on this bill and I think we can get the Senate to concur with us.

I do not think any of us want to go home and say that we voted against American workers, that we voted against American jobs, that we voted to allow the extraction of publicly owned resources, that work not go to Americans, but go to Korea.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FORD], a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times the House can be expected to negotiate the provisions of this legislation. I would like to remind my colleagues that the Senate passed the original conference report on H.R. 3128 twice. Two weeks ago, in a good-faith effort to get a bill enacted, the House Members took the unusual step of giving up important provisions that had been agreed upon by the conferees on this conference. We gave the Senate and the White House another bite at this apple.

The House amendment was passed by a vote of 314 to 86.

Now the Senate wants the House to give them even more. The Senate amendment deletes the provision that mandates the AFDC unemployed parent program. In half the States, a father must leave the home in order for his family to receive AFDC benefits. This misguided policy encourages family breakup.

In the conference agreement, we abolished this antifamily policy by mandating that all States provide assistance to two-parent needy families.

In the State of the Union Message in February, our President talked about the profamily provision in the study by the Domestic Policy Council, which will be headed up by the Attorney General, Ed Meese. He called upon welfare reform to strengthen the profamily. The AFDC-UP, unemployed parent, provision within the conference that the House reported out, and we have voted upon twice in this House, send very clear signals to this administration that the House of Representatives and the Ways and Means Committee responded to his profamily provision by saying that there are more than 26 States today that have not opted out for the father to live in the household.

We know that, of all the AFDC recipients, 50 percent or more come off the rolls within a 2-year period. We have seen just in the month of February that unemployment has jumped again beyond the 7 percentage points. If we want to respond to the family unit and the family structure of this Nation, then I say let Reagan be Reagan today and let us go on record in supporting the AFDC-unemployed-parent provision within this reconciliation package.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY].

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, there are clearly four issues before the House today. As was just mentioned, the AFDC problem, and prior to that the Buy American problem which is so important for American jobs and the American steel industry as such.

The third problem is should our Governors have a voice, not veto power, but a voice, a say, some input into offshore oil and gas drilling.

The fourth is the HE oil and gas settlement to the coastal States.

The Senate just significantly changed the proposal on the HE oil and gas settlement, meaning some 20 percent less to the States.

I suggest this is not fair. We had already at the beginning of this year agreed to give up the right to pre-1978 claims, a major concession as such.

I would suggest to my colleagues that the HE is not the overwhelming, overdriving issue here as such. I would urge my colleagues to stay with the House position.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, I am finding this whole process of the reconciliation bill to be one that is genuinely discouraging. It seems to me that we start out with a goal which has been obscured by what is now a turf battle between the House and the Senate and by what has become essentially a process which reminds me greatly of a minicontinuing resolution where everyone tries to get their program into a bill because they suspect that the bill is going to pass.

□ 1425

What we have here is not a piece of legislation which is directed at the original intent of the Budget Act or of this Congress, which was to reduce spending, and I will remind my colleagues that originally we were to reduce spending, or at least reduce this deficit, by approximately $60 billion.

What we have here today is a bill which is the product of what appears to be a backward potato race where people are bumbling all over each other in fights over turf and in fights over whose program is going to be saved where, and what new program which could not get through this House on its own merit is going to be added to this bill which appears to be on its way to passage in some form.

Clearly, our goals as a Congress should be to try to accomplish something on the deficit. Our goal should be to subscribe to what was the original purpose of the reconciliation bill, which was to reduce the deficit by approximately $60 billion.

We now have before us a bill which neither the Senate nor the House has produced which comes anywhere close to that, but at least the Senate bill makes a genuine attempt at increasing the reduction as versus a genuine attempt at reducing the reduction.

I would also note, as an aside, that it is inconceivable to me that on the House side we are going to produce a bill and claim it to be a spending reduction bill when 50 percent of that reduction involves increasing revenues. That is not reduction. The American people do not consider that to be a reduction, and I do not think this House should vote for a reduction which is actually a revenue raiser.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire of the gentlewoman from Illinois how many speakers the gentlewoman has remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] is entitled to close the debate.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I will be closing, Mr. Speaker. That will be the last speaker, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman is going to close, we have one more speaker and then I will close for this side, and we can agree to yield back the balance of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] reserves the balance of her time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. LOWRY], a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be redundant on important comments made by the previous speakers. I rise to oppose the motion to concur for the reasons that were stated.

I especially want to compliment our colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY], who just spoke in the well previous to me on the important compromise that was worked out on the Outer Continental Shelf revenues, a compromise to protect the rights of the States and Governors, that protected the environment, and gave a fair distribution of the revenues involved. The gentleman from Louisiana stated that well.

The Senate took that compromise that was worked out within the House and then worked out with the Senate, in which we concurred with the Senate and which then OMB comes up and cancels the compromise that was worked out in the normal process. This is a question of who makes decisions on this Hill, and it is very important that we do not concur with the motion that is before us, and that we table that motion and send our bill, which is a good bill, back to the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I oppose the motion to concur in the Senate version of the conference report on the omnibus budget reconciliation bill for several reasons, but I will limit my remarks to the amendment to section 19 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. This amendment is in the original conference bill that was agreed to by the conferees, and that has already been approved by both bodies at least once. The latest Senate version comes back to the House minus the section 19 amendment.

The effect of this amendment is simply stated. In conducting lease sales or approving oil and gas exploration or development plans, the Secretary of the Interior must "equally weigh" the need for oil and gas together with the need to protect other resources, including living marine resources. The decision is the Secretary's, not the Governors of coast States, and there is no veto given to the Governor over the Secretary's decisions. All the amendment does is to require that the Secretary weigh the need to protect fisheries, marine wildlife and State coastal resources on the same scale as he weighs the need to produce oil and gas. With this amendment the Secretary cannot unfairly tip the balance in favor of oil and gas.

This is not a veto as some have said. I fail to understand why Interior is so opposed to this amendment. Is it Interior's argument that unless oil and gas has a priority over all other resources and uses of the ocean, that Interior can never justify a lease sale or development plan? That is an outrageous argument, but it is certainly the only argument Interior makes.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this issue that we face this afternoon is not simply the issue of deficit reduction, for I have stood on this floor on many occasions and argued for the quick passage of the reconciliation bill, and I have done so feeling that as we delayed, there would be the loss of revenue and deficit reduction, but I have done so believing that we have operated in good faith.

The issue today is whether or not that good faith has continued. I submit to my colleagues that it has not primarily because what has happened is that the agreements reached in conference have been unilaterally changed by the other body and there have been provisions that have been added and sent back to us without an opportunity for this House to go to conference, discuss those changes.

Clearly, when one looks at those changes, one sees that we have tried in this body to compromise, going back as long as last year, in December, beginning on December 19 when we brought forth a conference agreement, and then going and meeting with the leadership, the White House and then meeting with leaders of the other body, and then working out several different arrangements. But each time that we came up with an arrangement of compromise and agreement, someone who was not at the table said, "No, I do not like it." It was always the White House.

Simply, we cannot operate that way, and today what we have before us is a piece of legislation that has significant changes that I do not believe this body wants to implement.

We have talked a lot about family values, and as the gentleman from Tennessee pointed out, if we are talking about strengthening the families, why, then will we not take the House position with regard to AFDC, which will provide a strengthening of the families. Why, then, are we closing the door on Federal employees once again and taking another whack out of them? Why, then, are we saying to 49 States, "Your medical systems are going to be reimbursed one way, but one State is going to have a different system"?

I do not believe that is what the House wants. I think that is why the House voted overwhelmingly last week to take the position, reaffirmed the same position that it held in December, and I simply say to all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, yes, I want to see speedy deficit reduction, but I want it in good faith. I want it done with agreement between the two bodies, and I do not believe it is in good faith when the White House comes in after we reach an agreement and says, "No, we do not like this," and so it unravels again.

I say to my colleagues, if we want an equitable settlement, if we want a compromise that represents us all, then I would urge my colleagues to vote against the motion to concur. I would urge Members to say no. I would urge Members to say to the other body that this is not the way that we should act as legislators. One should act in good faith, and certainly we should not slip into bills those items that would protect 1 State and throw out the other 49.

I say to those colleagues who are thinking about voting because they want deficit reduction, and because there is one item here of importance to them, think before you vote. Will your hospitals, will your health-care systems, will they support a vote that discriminates against them simply because of one State? I do not think so, and particularly when we have not had an opportunity to conference on it, to discuss it, to perhaps work out any agreements.

So, therefore, I urge all of my colleagues, in the same bipartisan way that we did last week, to say no to the motion to concur.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, in general, is accurate, but he is slightly in error. This is a reconciliation bill, and it is about deficit reduction.

Before we get to that deficit reduction, perchance we could talk about the two other issues that seem to be the only ones dominating the debate. One is the fact that one State gets treated differently than another, and the problem there is that we are all green with envy that we did not get in for our States.

Anybody here who has never gone home and chortled in a press release about how they put something over and how they got something for their district or their State that nobody else got, then you are the one person who can be offended because somebody else in the other body did something. I suggest that any time anyone has said that they got a housing project or some road money or that they have had a change, yes, in hospital reimbursements, or in a farm bill or in a defense contract, can hardly now claim to be virginal. They have already, too often, been back and forth to Reno, for heaven's sake.

The second argument involves one of institutional honesty. Whenever the majority party starts talking about institutions, I start getting worried but a little optimistic that the minority may be close to winning something. That is usually the last argument, that we have to do it for the House.

Let us take apart the arguments. Some people have complained that they have not been consulted. Good grief, I am handling the bill and I was not consulted. So what? An agreement has been reached. We can get a signature. And now we get to what the bill is really about: We can save some money. It is not a perfect bill. It is not a bill any of us would put on our campaign documents and say, "Here it is, the most wonderful thing ever passed," but it is $26 billion that we will not get.

We have been throwing this basketball back and forth, back and forth. Double overtime is over. Here it is.

□ 1435

For those of you who are concerned about the tobacco function, it is already here, and yes, it is retroactive, no promise later on we will take care of it. It is already in the Senate bill.

The problem is that lots of people want to talk about deficit reduction, but I think there are some people here that actually do not want to do it, that anytime you get near to really starting to squeeze, they immediately say there is something wrong with the bill.

There are going to be a complicated series of votes. Nothing is ever simple. I have a motion to concur; the gentleman will have a motion to table.

If you believe that there should be no deficit reduction, vote with the gentleman. If you believe that you are purer than driven snow and that every Member, 435, must be consulted, then you should vote to not concur. If you do not believe that the President has to sign a bill and, therefore, has to be a part of the argument, then vote with the gentleman.

Last night I had the joy of watching two Irishmen work together a crowd, one from my party, one from yours. I would suggest we try what they talked about last night, bipartisanship, and indeed work across the Rotunda. I would ask the Members regardless of party, regardless of region, to look at what really exists in this bill, to save $26 billion, to not give lie to the idea that we do want to save some money, and to vote to concur with our colleagues on the other side of the rotunda, to vote to concur across party lines and to get on with this year's budget since we only have 2 weeks before we are supposed to be finished with it.

This is a last-minute thing. It should have been handled long ago. Its time is over and our time is now.

Please vote to concur and no to table.

I yield back the balance of my time.

MOTION TO TABLE OFFERED BY MR. GRAY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania moves to table the motion to concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] to table the motion to concur offered by the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 217, nays 192, not voting 25, as follows:

Mrs. BENTLEY and Messrs. ARMEY, GREEN, HORTON, CONTE, GILMAN, and PETRI changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. HEFNER and Mr. VALENTINE changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion to table was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. GRAY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered a motion to disagree. My parliamentary inquiry is, would a motion to disagree to the last amendment of the Senate and request a conference thereon be a preferential motion to the motion to disagree, that is, more preferential?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would advise the gentleman in the affirmative, that is correct.

Mr. LOTT. Then Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will hold, the Clerk will first report the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion offered by Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania: Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 3128 with the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment thereto and to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would advise the Members that this is a very important matter. It is a very detailed parliamentary situation, and I am sure the Members would like to know what they are going to be voting on.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, which motion was read, was it my motion or that of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk has just read the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk will now report the preferential motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

PREFERENTIAL MOTION OFFERED BY MR. LOTT

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preferential motion offered by Mr. LOTT: Mr. LOTT moves to disagree to the last amendment of the Senate and request a conference thereon.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to table the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would ask which motion, the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT]?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I move to table the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] to table the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOTT. As the Chair has stated, this is a complicated parliamentary process we have here.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make sure that Members understand what they are about to vote on and that I understand what we are about to vote on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] made a motion to disagree to the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] made a motion to instruct—excuse the Chair—to disagree to the Senate amendment and to go to conference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now has moved to lay that on the table.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I believe the motion we offered was not to instruct conferees. The motion that was offered was to request a further conference with the Senate on the bill, H.R. 3128.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LOTT. So that we do not send this off into some dark hole, but so that we could have a conference to try to further work out the difficulties.

So my parliamentary inquiry is this: Is the vote at this time then on the motion to table the motion for a conference on this most important reconciliation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LOTT. So if you vote for the motion to table you are saying you do not even want to go to conference, is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, and the question occurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Illinois will state it.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am sure it was the noise of the body, but I did not hear the answer to the question that was posed by the Republican whip.

The question I believe was: When we vote on the motion to table going to conference a "yes" vote to table would mean you did not wish to go to conference on this important item, is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At this stage that would be an accurate statement.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to table offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 223, noes 186, not voting 25, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 3128.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4151, OMNIBUS DIPLOMATIC SECURITY AND ANTI-TERRORISM ACT

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 402 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 402

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4151) to provide for the security of United States diplomatic personnel, facilities, and operations, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of sections 311(a) and 401(b)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended (Public Law 93-344, as amended by Public Law 99-177), and with the provisions of clause 2(l)(6) of rule XI, are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and to the amendment made in order by this resolution and which shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. In lieu of the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now printed in the bill, it shall be in order to consider an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of the bill H.R. 4418 as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of section 303(a)4) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, clause 7 of rule XVI, and clause 5(a) of rule XXI, are hereby waived. No amendment to the bill or to said substitute shall be in order except the following amendments printed in the Congressional Record of March 17 by, and if offered by, the Member designated, and said amendments shall not be subject to amendment except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate: (1) the amendments by Representative McCain of Arizona and all points of order against the amendment striking out and reinserting paragraph 5569(d)(2) of title 5 of the United States Code as proposed by section 802(a) of the substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 as amended are hereby waived; and (2) the amendment by Representative Walker of Pennsylvania. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the amendment in the nature of a substitute made in order as original text by this resolution. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BURTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 402 is a modified closed rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986. This rule allows 2 hours of general debate, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The rule makes in order an amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text of H.R. 4418, as the original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule. The only amendments which may be offered to the substitute are two by Representative MCCAIN of Arizona and one by Representative WALKER of Pennsylvania printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 17.

Points of order are waived against H.R. 4151 for failure to comply with sections 311(a) and 401(b)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act. Section 311(a) provides that after Congress has completed action on the concurrent resolution on the budget, it shall not be in order to consider legislation which will cause the spending ceiling in the budget resolution to be breached. Since the spending ceiling for fiscal year 1986 has already been breached and the bill as introduced would result in fiscal year 1986 spending, it violates section 311(a). Considering the emergency nature of H.R. 4151, it was the opinion of the Rules Committee that this budget section could be waived, inasmuch as the enormity of the terrorist situation abroad could not be fully calculated prior to adoption of the fiscal year 1986 budget.

Section 401(b)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act prohibits consideration of new entitlement authority effective prior to October 1 of the year in which it is reported. The Rules Committee felt that the import objectives of H.R. 4151 would be needlessly postponed by delaying the effective date of this legislation until the start of the next fiscal year.

Additionally, points of order against consideration of the bill for failure to comply with clause 2(L)(6) of rule XI are waived. The 3-day layover requirement is waived to allow for immediate consideration of this bill.

The rule also waives section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act against the substitute. This provision prohibits the consideration of legislation providing new entitlement authority to take effect in a fiscal year for which a budget resolution has not yet been adopted. Title 8 of the substitute creates an entitlement to benefit victims of terrorism estimated to cost $1.5 million in fiscal year 1987. This section of the Budget Act is also waived against Representative MCCAIN's amendment. The Rules Committee has been advised that a majority of the members on the Budget Committee has no objection to these budget waivers.

Further, clause 5(a) of rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations in a legislative measure, is waived against the substitute. The substitute made in order by the rule would provide benefits to American victims of terrorism and would provide compensation for members of the Accountability Review Board, who are not Federal employees, for the time they serve on the Board. The Review Board would be charged with the responsibility of examining cases involving terrorist attacks on U.S. personnel or U.S. facilities abroad.

Finally, clause 7 of rule XVI is waived relating to non-germane amendments. This waiver is necessary since the substitute bill was much broader in scope than H.R. 4151 as introduced.

I should also add that the substitute cures the breach of budget authority in H.R. 4151 in the aforementioned waiver of section 311(a) of the Budget Act. Under the rule, one motion to recommit, with or without instructions is provided.

H.R. 4418 addresses the serious problem of inadequate security precautions at U.S. foreign facilities and for U.S. citizens traveling overseas. The escalation of terrorist activities abroad has created an overwhelming need for this protective measure. Necessary authorizations for this purpose are included for fiscal years 1986-90, based on a total estimate of $4.4 billion.

These authorizations would fund various activities to upgrade existing U.S. facilities, to expand Coast Guard duties in U.S. waterways and to create a reward and Counter-Terrorism Protection Fund. Further, H.R. 4418 speaks to the agonizing issue of the victims of terrorism, including hostages, so that certain compensations are authorized for U.S. citizens and their families.

H.R. 4418 also creates a Bureau of Diplomatic Security under the jurisdiction of the State Department with an adjunct Service whose Director is to be chosen from the Senior Foreign Service. The State Department is also directed to collect and maintain information on international terrorists and to coordinate their efforts with those of other government and foreign agencies as part of a terrorist reward fund. Added precautions are also taken in this legislation to minimize the threat of nuclear terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 402 provides for the consideration of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986, subject to 2-hours of general debate and a restrictive amendment process. The rule makes in order an amendment in the nature of a substitute which shall be the text of H.R. 4418 as introduced yesterday. That substitute shall in turn be subject to only three amendments, two by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN], and one by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], both of which were printed in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, the rule contains a number of waivers. Sections 311(a) and 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act are waived against the introduced bill. Both of those were necessary because the bill authorizes a new Assistant Secretary of State to head the new Bureau of Diplomatic Security.

Because the introduced bill would have fixed the salary of the new Assistant Secretary at level IV of the Executive Schedule effective in this fiscal year, that is considered an entitlement prohibited under section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act, and would also breach the section 311(a) aggregate spending ceiling for this year's budget. However, the amendment in the nature of a substitute made in order by this rule clears up these two problems by making the entitlement authority effective on October 1—the beginning of the next fiscal year.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute also creates a new entitlement for victims of terrorism, also effective fiscal 1987. Both it and the salary provision require a section 303(a)(4) Budget Act waiver since we have not yet adopted our first budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. However, the chairman of the Budget Committee has indicated that a majority of his committee supports this waiver given the "emergency and important nature of the bill," and the small amount of funding involved—an estimated $1.5 million.

I would point out, however, that this rule does make in order an amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] that would change this victims of terrorism entitlement to an authorization subject to annual appropriations. Another amendment by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN] would reduce the amount of compensation from a worldwide per diem to $20 a day. That amendment also requires a section 303(a)(4) Budget Act waiver because it provides for an alternative entitlement option.

The other McCain amendment made in order by this rule would eliminate the President's discretion to award more compensation to those hostages receiving harsher treatment.

Finally, this rule waives clause 2(l)(6) of House Rule XI, the 3-day layover requirement, against the consideration of the bill. And it waives clause 7, rule XVI, the germaneness rule, and clause 5, rule XXI, prohibiting appropriations in legislation, against consideration of the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. Speaker, I think I should say a few words about this expedited and closed process since it's something I usually do not think is advisable, and I'm even uncomfortable with it now, though I have signed off on it subject to certain conditions and understandings. As I mentioned, the majority leadership has put this antiterrorism legislation on a fast track because it is an important and urgent concern. This is also something in which the administration has considerable interest. Most of the recommendations of the administration's advisory panel on overseas security, headed by Adm. Bobby Inman, are incorporated in this bill.

In addition, the bill was reported from both committee and subcommittee by unanimous voice vote, in fine bipartisan fashion. And other committees have cooperated on aspects of this issue which are within their jurisdiction, while waiving their jurisdictional claims to expedite matters. Several provisions have been included in the substitute too at the request of these other committees of jurisdiction.

It was the original intention of the Foreign Affairs committee to bring up this measure under a suspension of the rules. I raised some objection at that time because I felt anything that might cost $4.4 billion over 5 years deserves more scrutiny and debate than that process affords—that is, only 40 minutes of debate and no amendment.

Chairman FASCELL was very gracious in attempting to work out an alternate process that would be both expeditious and fair. And it was agreed among the bipartisan leadership that a modified closed rule would be requested after all Members had been put on notice of this request. The chairman accordingly made this announcement on the floor last Thursday, during the consideration of other business. It was understood that the Rules Committee would then decide which amendments to make in order after hearing from Members. This is essentially what we did. We did deny two requests to make in order nongermane amendments, and one to strike a section. But otherwise we made in order what was requested of us.

So, I think we have fashioned a fair rule given the time constraints on us for considering this measure, though I certainly don't want anyone to think this is a precedent we will be following frequently. I, for one, do not like to shut Members off at this vital stage of the legislative process. Even when there is advance notice of a restrictive rule request, many Members are not able to focus on a bill's provisions until the day before or the day of debate. So let's consider this a unique situation given the importance and urgency of the issue involved and the priority given to this by both the majority leadership and the administration.

Mr. Speaker, while the bill does not directly specify the amount being authorized, it's understood that we are talking about a $4.4 billion, 5-year program, most of which will go toward rebuilding or remodeling our missions abroad for security purposes, and improving our security services in those missions. This is not a small amount, given our new Gramm-Rudman requirements, and I would urge my colleagues to pay close attention to the debate that will ensue to judge for yourselves the merits of the bill.

□ 1600

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 6 minutes to the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the antiterrorism bill. I compliment Chairman FASCELL, Chairman MICA, Congressman BROOMFIELD, and Congresswoman SNOWE for working with all the relevant committees to produce a bill which is a strong weapon in fighting terrorism, but not at the cost of relinquishing important rights.

I want to also thank the Rules Committee for permitting the Foreign Affairs Committee to add a new title XI. Title XI is the text of H.R. 4371, which I introduced last week. The bill deals with security at military bases abroad. It tells the Secretary of Defense to review the security arrangements at all bases and, in particular, at the family housing areas, to determine whether stronger measures are needed. The bill also encourages the Secretary of Defense to step up security and antiterrorism training for members of the military and members of their families.

We have been fortunate that terrorists have not targeted the families of our service members. I'm afraid it is only a matter of time. I do not want to scare military family members unnecessarily, but I want them prepared. Title XI charges the Secretary of Defense with the responsibility for preparing military families to combat terrorism.

I am delighted that the Armed Services Committee and the Defense Department were cooperative in the development of this proposal.

Title VIII of this bill, which is the only title subject to amendment, is the hostage compensation package which the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service favorably reported last summer. In fact, we have been working on this legislation since before the Iranian hostages were freed. It has been 6 years that we have been unable to resolve this issue. During this time, one of the Iranian hostages has died, probably from captivity related illness. I think it is a scandal that we have not been able to pass this legislation until now.

The fundamental purpose of the victims of terrorism legislation is to provide Federal workers, members of the military, and their families with a stable, permanent set of benefits which will apply in all future cases. Former hostages testified that they thought about their families a great deal while they were in captivity. They hoped that their families were being cared for in their absence. This legislation provides that assurance.

For this legislation to achieve its goal, we must reject the McCain and Walker amendments. To eliminate the entitlement nature of these benefits, as the Walker amendment would do, would undermine the peace of mind which this legislation is intended to provide. To reduce the payment from $66 per day to $20 per day, as the McCain amendment would do, would violate the consensus to reimburse hostages who are not free at least equally with those who are free and asked to travel for the Government.

Title III of the bill contains a new accountability board to investigate terrorist attacks on American missions abroad and to find out whether any Government employee was responsible for inadequate security. The Subcommittee on Civil Service, which I chair, worked with the Foreign Affairs Committee to ensure that existing due process rights would apply. I think the language in the bill before us meets the goal of heightening concern about security without reducing anyone's rights.

H.R. 4151 is a good bill which should be adopted.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE].

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for yielding me this time.

First of all, I would like to compliment the gentleman from Mississippi and the entire Rules Committee for lending their assistance and accommodating our position and our interests in moving this legislation along.

Mr. Speaker, as ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on International Operations, I join the ranking member on the full Foreign Affairs Committee, and the chairman of the subcommittee and full committee in support of the rule. In preparing this legislation, the Foreign Affairs Committee worked with the majority and minority on all of the other committees that share jurisdiction over terrorist issues. And in seeking the rule, we consulted with both the Republican and Democratic leadership of the House.

As Members of this body are certainly aware, international terrorism presents a serious challenge to the conduct of U.S. foreign policy. This legislation is vital to approaching the problem of terrorism in a comprehensive manner, and will provide greater security to those who serve the United States abroad. The administration strongly supports this legislation. Just yesterday I received a letter from the President urging swift and positive action on this bill. The subcommittee and the full Foreign Affairs Committee gave its unanimous approval of the legislation as well.

The rule we are considering is not intended to exclude any views or approaches, and I would like to point out that the rule specifically makes in order amendments relating to terrorism proposed by Members. This rule is necessary so that the House may approve this important legislation in an expeditious fashion. With all of the other important measures the House must consider this week, we must move swiftly to prevent serious delay of final passage of this bill.

During general debate, I will go into more detail about the pressing need for this legislation, and the importance that we move quickly. I urge my colleagues to approve the rule so that we may consider this legislation further.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to my distinguished colleague from California [Mrs. BURTON] for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support H.R. 4151 and the rule making its consideration in order.

The right moment to take decisive action on terrorism is now. This bill is an appropriate and a vital first step. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this essential legislation. The distinguished chairmen of the Foreign Affairs Committee and its International Operations Subcommittee and their respective ranking members are to be commended for their tireless efforts on this issue and on this legislation.

The bill properly emphasizes multilateral approaches to this difficult problem. Terrorism, by its very nature, is an essentially international problem. We are not going to solve it without the concerted efforts of many nations, East and West. We must build now on the new-found readiness of other nations to address this issue. The bill directs the President to seek the establishment of an International Anti-Terrorism Committee, to work toward better sharing of information with other governments, and to exert efforts to curb the abuse of diplomatic status. These steps mark an indispensable beginning.

International nuclear terrorism is a potential problem that we must address before it leads to a catastrophe of unimaginable proportions. Title VI of the bill is devoted entirely to this issue. It focuses on the security of nuclear materials and on the enforcement of effective standards in this area.

The security of our diplomats and diplomatic facilities must be adequately protected. This bill sets forth a comprehensive program to ensure that our foreign policy will not be held hostage to international terrorism.

The bill also addresses the thorny issue of exports to states which are involved in international terrorism. Export controls can be an unwieldy tool of foreign policy, but their use is sometimes called for. The bill implements the judgment that, as a matter of policy, we should not permit our exports to be used to enhance international terrorism. At the same time, it gives the executive branch sufficient flexibility to carry out the policy intelligently in the context of our overall foreign policy.

A companion provision covers those who knowingly and intentionally lend aid and comfort to international terrorism through the provision of training or technical services.

Before I close, I would like to refer to one provision which Mr. MRAZEK, Mr. SCHUMER, and I had hoped to offer as an amendment to this legislation: A section banning the importation and manufacture of an emerging generation of plastic polymer firearms that can invisibly slip through x-ray machines and metal detectors. Plastic guns have no advantage as sporting equipment or for self-defense: The only value they have over metal guns is that they can be hidden from security equipment. Unless Congress takes action, this emerging generation of nonmetal weapons may render the security measures of every airport in the country obsolete.

Because the proposed amendment is an antiterrorism measure, we felt this bill would be the proper vehicle for it. Since we were unable to offer it today, however, we intend to offer it as an amendment to H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act, when it comes to the floor.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the rule. The rule is flawed largely because what it does is put in the House procedure here more budget waivers, and that disturbs me.

I will say that I certainly appreciate the work that has gone into trying to correct this problem. If this rule passes, I will have an amendment in order that will take care of the budget waiver problem by striking out the entitlement program. My problem with the rule is that I should not have to offer an amendment to a bill to put it into compliance with what is already the law. The law states that we ought not be passing new entitlement programs. Here we have a brand new entitlement program that we are bringing out here in violation of the budget law and in violation of Gramm-Rudman. I have a problem with that.

The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and his staff worked with me in order to draft an amendment that will, in fact, help correct the bill if, in fact, we get past the rule, and I will offer that amendment. I think it would clear up the procedure enormously.

But the fact is we have got a rule before us right now which waives the Budget Act, which is a violation of Gramm-Rudman, and which does specifically what this House has said in the past we were not going to do, and that is create new entitlements before we have passed a budget.

This rule would permit that, and I think that it is another example of why we end up with huge budget deficits around here, because we simply do not live within our own procedures. We do not do what is required of us.

Budget deficits do not just happen; they are made and they are made right here in this Chamber. This rule is another example of making budget deficits.

So I would respectfully suggest that the Members vote against the rule. If the rule passes, however, I would hope that the Members would at least vote to correct the problem that we have created in this bill by creating a new entitlement program by voting for the amendment that I will offer that will change the entitlement program to an annual authorization and appropriation situation. That way, we would assure that we do not create a new entitlement program. It would not hurt the effort in any way to compensate the hostages and the families of the hostages. It would ensure that there is no entitlement money available, but rather it falls under the regular appropriations process.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill before us, H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986. This legislation is the result of the dedicated work of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on which I have the privilege to serve. I want to pay special tribute to my colleagues from Florida, Mr. FASCELL, chairman of the full Committee on Foreign Affairs and its Subcommittee on Arms Control, International Security and Science, and Mr. MICA, chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, without whose perseverance this bill would not be before us today.

The increase of international terrorism is something which deeply concerns all of us. The memory of the bombing of the Marine barracks in Lebanon, the hijacking of TWA flight No. 847, the hijacking of the Achille Lauro in which a disabled United States citizen was murdered, and most recently, the assassination of Prime Minister Olaf Palme, in Sweden, one of the most peaceful, peace-loving countries in the world—all are vivid reminders of the spread of the scourge of international terrorism. Responsible nations must work together to do everything possible to inhibit its spread, and the United States has a responsibility to lead in those efforts. This legislation is designed to do that.

This bill contains many important provisions designed to provide enhanced diplomatic security and to combat international terrorism. Titles I through IV contain provisions which specifically address diplomatic security, and include the Inman Commission recommendations as amended by the Subcommittee on International Operations. Implementation of these recommendations will increase the security of our own citizens who serve our country abroad.

Title V, State Department Authorities to Combat International Terrorism, is intended to enhance the Department of State's ability to deal with the growing threat of international terrorism. It contains provisions to require the Secretary of State to maintain and publish a list of the most wanted international terrorists and provides for rewards to be offered by the Secretary with respect to individuals on that list, and individuals sought for an act of international terrorism resulting in the death of a United States citizen or national or involving detention of such person for more than 60 days. There is also a provision authorizing the Secretary of State to offer rewards for information relating to international narcoterrorism and drug trafficking.

There is a provision to prevent the export of items on the United States munitions list to countries which provide support or sanctuary for international terrorism, including support or sanctuary for any individual terrorist or any terrorist group.

I would like to say something in detail about section 507 of title V, issuance of travel advisories on account of terrorism supported by Libya, Iran, or other foreign governments. This provision is similar to a resolution I introduced on February 19, 1986.

Section 507 expresses the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State should consider the issuance of a travel advisory or other appropriate notice warning United States citizens of the dangers of traveling in any foreign country in which United States citizens; first, are attacked by terrorists supported by Libya or Iran if the government of that country fails to act immediately to require the closing of any Libyan official missions in that country or any Iranian official missions in that country, as the case may be; or second, are attacked by terrorists supported by any other foreign government which used its official missions to support that attack, if that foreign government is not immediately required to close all of its official missions in the country in which the attack occurred.

I want to state for the record why I am so concerned about Libya, the focus of my original resolution.

As we all know, on December 27, 1985, 12 United States citizens were wounded and 5 murdered in cold-blooded attacks at the Rome and Vienna airports. The individuals who carried out these attacks were members of the Libyan-backed Palestinian terrorist group, headed by Abu Nidal. Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qadhafi applauded and praised these attacks.

In response to these heinous attacks, President Reagan severed virtually all trade links with Libya, froze its assets in the United States and ordered the more than 1,000 Americans working there to leave immediately. He also said that the United States would "not understand" if other countries moved into Libya "to take commercial advantage of our departure." In addition, he called on our NATO allies to join us in isolating Libya and its outlaw leader, Colonel Qadhafi.

However, no European country has fully endorsed President Reagan's call for total economic sanctions against Libya. In fact, our allies have been cool to leveling sanctions against Colonel Qadhafi and his country. Deputy Secretary of State John Whitehead was dispatched to visit nine of our NATO allies in the hope of persuading them to reduce their ties with Libya. Unfortunately, the results of his efforts were less than gratifying.

In January the U.S. Department of State issued a report called "Libya Under Qadhafi: A Pattern of Aggression." This report makes clear that Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qadhafi has used terrorism as one of the primary instruments of his foreign policy and that he supports radical groups which use terrorist tactics. Qadhafi's activities include threats, material support for terrorism, cooperation, economic incentives and intimidation, and military aggression. He provides logistical support for terrorist operations, such as supplying passports to the Abu Nidal members responsible for the December attack on the El Al ticket counter in Vienna.

Training for radical Palestinians and other radical elements frequently takes place in Libya. During Qadhafi's reign there have been numerous instances of Libyan-sponsored attacks against United States interests, and during the past 18 months Qadhafi has made public references to expanding his terrorism campaign to include United States targets.

The responsible international community suffers from Qadhafi's disrespect for international norms of behavior and accepted diplomatic practices. Qadhafi blantantly uses terrorist violence against political opponents and has abused diplomatic privilege for terrorist purposes, such as using Libyan embassies and diplomatic pouches for transferring and storing weapons and explosives.

Colonel Qadhafi's support for terrorist acts has clearly jeopardized the safety of United States citizens. It is clearly the responsibility of the United States Government to protect the safety of all our citizens, at all times and in all places. In addition, it is in the interest of the responsible world community to isolate Libya economically, politically, and militarily to the greatest extent possible.

Yet we have not been able to get our NATO allies to join us in isolating the outlaw Qadhafi.

That is why I introduced my original resolution. We simply must find a way to encourage our allies to take sanctions against the Qadhafis of the world. One way to do that is through economic incentives. U.S. tourists spend millions of U.S. dollars in foreign countries. Issuance of a travel advisory results in the loss of millions of dollars in revenues in the country for which an advisory is issued. If countries where United States citizens are attacked do not reduce their ties with Libya, and do not make their country safe for United States citizens, then it is appropriate for the U.S. Government to take action to protect our own people.

If the U.S. Secretary of State issues travel advisories for such countries, we might see a far different response to terrorism by our allies. The United States issued a travel advisory for Greece last June after the TWA hijacking out of Athens. Greece lost enough United States revenue to encourage it to quickly overhaul the security at the airport. If the Secretary had issued travel advisories of Italy and Austria after the attacks on United States citizens last June, perhaps they would feel compelled to take actions to make their countries safer.

In short, we must find a way to encourage our allies to take actions against terrorists and terrorism. We must find a way to isolate the Qadhafis and Khomeinis from the responsible world community. The provisions of section 507 will help do that.

Title VI, International Nuclear Terrorism, expresses the high priority the committee places on finding responses to the threat of international nuclear terrorism before the United States is faced with such an act, and in establishing effective measures to protect nuclear facilities and weapons-grade materials from acts of terrorism.

Title VII, Multilateral Cooperation to Combat International Terrorism, emphasizes the importance the Committee on Foreign Affairs places on gaining multilateral cooperation among our friends and allies to more effectively combat, on a worldwide basis, the growing threat of international terrorism.

Title VIII, Victims of Terrorism Compensation, provides for benefits of captives and compensation for disability or death.

The purpose of title IX, Maritime Security, is to establish an effective regime for maintaining security standards at both domestic and foreign ports. It includes measures to improve seaport and shipboard security, and to prevent unlawful acts against passengers and crews on board ships. In addition, there are provisions to require a maritime risk assessment.

Last, title X establishes a fellowship program, named the Fascell Fellowship Program, after the respected chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The purpose is to afford the fellowship recipients the opportunity to serve on a short-term basis at a United States diplomatic mission in the Soviet Union or Eastern Europe to obtain firsthand working exposure to the country in which they serve. This program is a fitting tribute to the work and interests of an individual whom it has been a privilege to work with and learn from.

Terrorism is one of the worst international problems of our time, and it is growing. The legislation before us is a responsible way to try to bring this problem under control. It is the result of much cooperation and effort on the part of those who worked on it. It is a good bill and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. I would like to say a few words on behalf of this rule and this bill.

Mr. Speaker, terrorism is a cancer which could destroy us all. Its virulent message has coarsened our sensibilities and has cheapened our sense of humanity. The evil agents that aid this international disease must be checked.

I am pleased that a partial remedy for this destructive condition exists in H.R. 4418, appropriately entitled the Diplomatic Security Act. This legislation will provide a needed security apparatus to protect our dedicated civil servants who have committed themselves to a life of selfless public service. It will further provide, via the Department of State, the training assistance and related equipment to host Government personnel assigned to protect U.S. Government employees and missions abroad.

Because the United States has an imperative interest in protecting U.S. citizens serving their country abroad, I urge adoption of the proposed rule for consideration of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. WHITTEN, TRAXLER, MCHUGH, NATCHER, AKAKA, WATKINS, DURBIN and SMITH of Iowa, Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska, Messrs. MYERS of Indiana, ROGERS, and SKEEN.

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on H.R. 4151, the bill about to be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

OMNIBUS DIPLOMATIC SECURITY AND ANTI-TERRORISM ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 402 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4151.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4151) to provide for the security of U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities, and operations, and for other purposes, with Mr. KLECZKA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4151, as amended, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986.

As you know, this legislation has been expedited at the request of the administration and House leadership and was developed in bipartisan cooperation with five other committees sharing jurisdiction over various provisions contained in this legislation.

I want to express my gratitude to the chairmen, ranking members and to all the members of the Committees on Armed Services, on the Judiciary, on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, on Post Office and Civil Service, and on Public Works and Transportation, who contributed to the writing of this milestone legislation to protect American Embassies, diplomats, their families, and ordinary businessmen and tourist travelers against the scourge of international terrorism.

H.R. 4151 as amended, enjoys the support of the administration and includes among its many important initiatives, the President's request for major enhancement of diplomatic security stemming from the Inman panel recommendations; implementation of most of the recommendations from the recently released report of the Vice President BUSH's Task Force on Terrorism—text of Vice President BUSH's letter lauding H.R. 4151, as amended appears at the end of this statement—and a new process to improve maritime security patterned after the successful Foreign Airport Security Act which was enacted last year; and a request that the Secretary of Defense review U.S. military base security abroad and institute an antiterrorist training program for members of the Armed Forces and their families.

The chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, Mr. MICA and the ranking minority member, Ms. SNOWE, will explain the diplomatic security provisions in the four titles in detail. Therefore, I would like to take this opportunity to review for our colleagues what action the Congress has already taken to combat international terrorism and to describe the new measures in this legislation.

Over the past 3 years, the Committee on Foreign Affairs has initiated, both passive and active measures to combat the growing threat of international terrorism. These include:

The establishment of a bipartisan staff task force to review diplomatic security including host government cooperation in protecting U.S. citizens and embassies as well as to study the foreign policy implications of international terrorism;

The authorization of the antiterrorism assistance program which provides training and equipment to some 40 friendly countries in such areas as upgrading airport security, providing courses in hostage negotiation, bomb disposal techniques, and so forth;

The enactment of the necessary enabling legislation to implement the treaties on aircraft sabotage and hostage taking;

The authorization of an emergency supplemental embassy security enhancement program in the wake of third Beirut bombing;

The creation of a rewards program for information leading to the arrest and conviction of international terrorists;

The adoption of a significant measure to enhance foreign airport security which mandates unilateral, bilateral and multilateral steps to upgrade security at foreign international airports and provides for stringent enforcement measures; and

The adoption of landmark U.S. resolutions during the 40th U.N. General Assembly which recognize all acts of international terrorism as criminal and specifically condemn the hostage taking.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the authorization of the Inman panel recommendations, this bill contains numerous measures which complement and add to these accomplishments. Some of these provisions include:

The establishment of new maritime security procedures, similar to those enacted in the foreign airport security legislation;

Additional authorization for rewards, including the initiation of a new program targetted against "narcoterrorists" and the establishment of a witness protection fund;

A requirement that the President actively seek the establishment of an international coordinating committee whose sole focus is international terrorism;

Measures directed against state-sponsored terrorism, including controls on certain services and exports to countries which aid and abet international terrorist organizations;

Measures to prevent nuclear terrorism, including directing the President to seek universal adherence to the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, and to review the adequacy of physical protection regarding the international transit of nuclear materials;

Steps to enhance multilateral cooperation to combat international terrorism, including enhanced information sharing on passports and visas and directing the President to seek the adoption of a U.N. resolution condemning the use of diplomatic privileges and immunities; and

The establishment of a program to compensate U.S. Government personnel who are victims of terrorist attacks.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset, the administration and the House leadership fully support this legislation. The threat to the lives and safety of our people working abroad is very real. International terrorism continues to be a blot against humanity, and Americans remain prime targets for these heartless killers.

I urge the unanimous approval of this vital legislation.

The text of the letter from the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the Honorable LES ASPIN, in support of this legislation follows:

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, March 18, 1986.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR DANTE: I want you to know how much I appreciate your Committee's prompt and bipartisan action on the legislative recommendations of the Vice President's Task Force on Combatting Terrorism. Inasmuch as this report was publicly released on March 6, 1986, it is particularly gratifying to see such quick action.

When we met last September to discuss the work of the Task Force your pledge of cooperation was most welcome. I know that Admiral Holloway and his staff worked closely with your staff during ensuing months.

This will become a major part of our overall program to combat international terrorism. I urge speedy enactment of the legislation that is necessary to complete this important work.

Sincerely,

GEORGE BUSH.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC, March 12, 1986.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR DANTE: I understand your committee is reporting omnibus legislation to combat terrorism in H.R. 4151.

I am advised that the bill, as amended in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, affects the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services in two ways. In Title VIII, it provides benefits for military personnel and their dependents comparable to those provided for civilian employees and similarly situated persons who are captured, kidnaped, or otherwise deprived of their liberty as a result of hostile action directed against the United States. In Title III, it establishes accountability review procedures for cases of serious injury, loss of life, or significant destruction of property related to a U.S. government mission abroad.

I am also advised that you intend to bring the bill to the floor in the near future. Of course, I note the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services over legislation affecting benefits for and disciplinary actions involving military personnel. In the interest of expediting the business of the House, however, the Committee on Armed Services will not seek sequential referral of the bill. At the same time, we would be pleased to see included in the legislation the security training bill introduced yesterday by Congresswoman Schroeder.

Because questions of committee jurisdiction can be so troublesome in the handling of omnibus legislation, I would appreciate your making this correspondence a matter of record. No doubt should exist that our respective committees worked together in developing the pertinent parts of this bill. Indeed, our willingness to refrain from seeking sequential referral of H.R. 4151 should indicate our satisfaction with the product of our joint efforts on the bill.

I look forward to our working together on other matters that affect our respective jurisdictions.

Sincerely,

LES ASPIN,
Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida has consumed 7 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let us face the facts. The threat of terrorism is real. It will be with us for many years. Americans will continue to be the prime targets of terrorists. This bill does something about the problem of terrorism. It has the administration's blessing. It deserves our support.

I want to commend the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee for his leadership in bringing this bill to the floor. I also want to point out the fine support which this bill received from Congressman MICA and Congresswoman SNOWE on the subcommittee level.

We must do all that we can to protect our fellow citizens serving at high-threat embassies. We must confront the menace of terrorism by using a variety of options. The legislation before us today gives our Government those badly needed options.

The bill implements many of the recommendations of the Inman panel—a bipartisan blue ribbon group which studied the problem of terrorism and embassy protection.

The Secretary of State recently wrote to me and noted that although this is the year of great budget stringency, the "safety of our people is of the utmost importance."

This legislation authorizes a major embassy building effort. Our new embassies will better protect our people against terrorist attacks. Some of the provisions in the bill focus on improving shipboard and port security. It also provides authority to control certain terrorism-related services and provides measures to protect against nuclear terrorism.

This antiterrorism package incorporates many of the recommendations of the Vice President's Task Force on Combatting Terrorism.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is a statement of Congress' commitment both to the protection of our citizens serving overseas, and to the battle against terrorism.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has consumed 3 minutes.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, first let me take this opportunity to commend the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] and my ranking minority member on my subcommittee, the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] for the excellent job that they have done on this legislation. We have spent several years working on this legislation. Members realize that some of the origins of the key provisions of this legislation came after the Beirut bombing, as a result of the Inman Commission, and as a result of what I consider to be probably one of the most cooperative and most bipartisan approaches we have seen in this Congress.

H.R. 4151, the Diplomatic Security Act, represents the culmination of years of effort on the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to provide the Department with the tools it needs to manage security programs at U.S. missions abroad, to move ahead on the design and construction of safer embassies, and to provide security for foreign dignitaries in the United States. I think that this legislation will strengthen the Department's security operation, and give the Congress the oversight it needs to ensure that the diplomatic security program proceeds on time and on budget.

Work on this legislation has proceeded on strictly bipartisan lines, with the subcommittee's ranking minority member, Ms. SNOWE, taking a strong hand in the crafting of this bill. As a result, this legislative initiative enjoys the support of both sides of the aisle beginning with the support of the President, the Secretary of State, and the leadership of this House.

The Diplomatic Security Act is essential to our continued diplomatic presence overseas. We have a commitment to the safety of our diplomats and their families overseas at a time when Americans are targeted for terrorist attacks. We also have a commitment to protect our diplomatic missions which symbolize America abroad. This bill signals nations that support terrorism that we intend to maintain our diplomatic presence abroad.

Let me point out a few of the features of this bill.

It reorganizes the Department of State with respect to the security function, spelling out the Secretary's responsibility for the development and implementation of programs and policies which protect our diplomatic missions overseas. This includes responsibility for the personnel and operations of a variety of U.S. Government agencies overseas.

It presents the Secretary with full responsibility for the coordination of all U.S. Government personnel assigned to U.S. missions abroad, and for the establishment of staffing levels at these posts.

It establishes a Bureau of Diplomatic Security in the Department of State to be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Diplomatic Security responsible for overseas and domestic security and protective operations, management of counterterrorism planning and coordination programs, technical security, and personnel training.

Within the Bureau of Diplomatic Security, the bill creates a new Diplomatic Security Service to be headed by an experienced career civil service or foreign service member.

Of critical importance, the legislation provides a mechanism for determining accountability for failures of the security system in cases resulting in serious injury, loss of life, or significant destruction of property. An Accountability Review Board, convened by the Secretary of State, shall examine the facts surrounding a serious security breach, and make findings as to the operational causes of that failure and possible breach of duty by any individual concerned.

Finally, this amendment would authorize a comprehensive embassy construction program which would conform to the recommendations of the Inman panel and speed up our security upgrade program worldwide to meet the growing terrorist threat. This legislation authorizes the President's request for $4.4 billion over the next 5 years for the Department's Diplomatic Security Program. Of these funds, $1.6 billion will provide for the salaries and expenses of such programs as the public access control projects, perimeter security systems, armored vehicle program, residential security, passport and visa fraud investigations, and for the protection of foreign dignitaries and missions in the United States.

The remaining funds will be for the Diplomatic Construction Program. With these funds, the Department will significally upgrade 254 American facilities overseas, including 79 new embassy compounds.

The cost, in terms of actual dollars spent, will be considerably lower in the early years. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that this program will result in actual outlays of only $250 million in fiscal year 1987. This is a result of committee action with respect to the priority of projects, the proposed obligation schedule, and the manner in which the Office of Foreign Buildings will organize to implement this ambitious construction program.

Many Members, including the gentlewoman from Maine, OLYMPIA SNOWE, and myself, have repeatedly questioned whether the program request had been sufficiently scrutinized. In my opinion, there can never be enough scrutiny for a program of this magnitude. However, this program has already undergone significant review.

When the Inman panel recommended the replacement of 126 embassies and upgrade of twice as many, the total cost was estimated at $5 billion for construction alone. After reviewing the recommendation, the Department of State submitted to the Office of Management and Budget a $3 billion construction package. Today, we are seeking approval for a Diplomatic Construction Program limited to $2.7 billion, or nearly half of the original recommendation.

Scrutiny by my subcommittee will not end here today. We fully intend to closely oversee the entire program. To this end we have built into the legislation suitable notification requirements to the Congress on each appropriation request. The appropriate committee must be notified before any funds may be obligated for any given project. We have also established procedures for the treatment of cost overruns and the promotion of contract efficiency.

Another aspect of this bill deserving special consideration is the committee's action regarding preference for U.S. contractors. The committee feels very strongly that Americans should be called upon to build our embassies abroad not only because it is concerned about the quality of construction and the sensitive nature of these facilities, but also because it feels that the way to make sure our missions best reflect the principles for which we stand is to have qualified Americans, including minority contractors build them. Therefore, we have included very strong language in title IV establishing a clear preference for U.S. contractors. Section 402, also directs the Department of State to allocate, to the extent practicable, 10 percent of the funds available for contracts with American minority contractors. I feel very strongly about this language which was authored by my colleague, Congressman DYMALLY. I urge the Department to make every effort possible to meet the requirements of this provision. The subcommittee expects the Department will report on regular, perhaps quarterly, basis regarding the implementation of this provision.

Title 8 of this bill provides compensation for victims of terrorism who are U.S. Government employees and are captured as a result of their relationship with the U.S. Government. It provides certain medical and educational benefits for hostages and their families to help them weather the crisis.

This title also provides for a cash payment to hostages based on the duration of their captivity. This is an issue that the United States has failed to address since the taking of American hostages in Iran 5 years ago. I think that we can all support measures which will finally fulfill any remaining obligation to this group of men and women who were held so long in captivity, and which will provide assurance to any future victims of terrorism that their families will be cared for.

In conclusion, I am proud to stand here today and present to this House the fruit of this committee's long effort. We have put together a comprehensive legislative proposal which will, if enacted, at last provide the U.S. Government the necessary tools to follow our words with actions. I urge the Members of this House to join us in taking this first step to fight terrorism wherever and however it appears.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER].

(By unanimous consent, Mr. VOLKMER was allowed to speak out of order.)

OFFERING AN AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE TO H.R. 4332, A SUBSTITUTE FOR H.R. 9545

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to announce to the committee and to the House in general that immediately upon speaking later I will be providing the Clerk an amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 4332 which was reported last week from the Committee on the Judiciary. This is a substitute for my basic bill, H.R. 9545, with some amendments to it. I plan to be offering it on Thursday as a substitute for the judiciary bill.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, at this time I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on International Operations of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this legislation represents an unprecedented effort by Congress to upgrade U.S. security standards across the board as well as to establish a new security ethic and apparatus within the Department of State. The legislation before us today also contains vital new counterterrorism efforts, many of them proposed by the Inman Panel on Overseas Security and the Vice President's task force on combating terrorism.

The subcommittee was involved in drafting two of the bills that form the core of this legislation. One of course is the Diplomatic Security Act and the other is the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act. First, I would like to commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the ranking member for their leadership in bringing this very important issue to the floor today. I also express my appreciation to the chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations for his cooperation in working with the members of the committee.

As always, and with all of the issues that have come before the subcommittee, he has always worked to accommodate the views and positions of the members of the committee. I want to express my appreciation for all of the Members to the chairman of the subcommittee for that cooperation.

□ 1645

Through consensus and true bipartisanships, our subcommittee has conducted a considerable amount of work on the important issues of diplomatic security and counterterrorism. The product of much of that work is contained in this bill. Both the Diplomatic Security Act and the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act were reported out of the subcommittee and full Foreign Affairs Committee unanimously.

The growing number of terrorist incidents, particularly the many targetted at Americans working for the U.S. Government abroad, make this legislation urgently needed. During the past two decades, terrorists have killed as many U.S. diplomats as were killed in the previous 180 years. In the past decade alone, terrorists have attacked U.S. officials or installations an average of once every 17 days.

This trend has become even more pronounced in the past 3 years. Last year, the State Department recorded 812 incidents of international terrorism, 30 percent of which were aimed at Americans and American interests, with U.S. diplomats the most common targets. This represented 200 more incidents than the previous year, and 300 more than the year before that.

Our subcommittee held a number of briefings and hearings on this particular issue. We heard testimony from a variety of witnesses who are experts in the field of international terrorism, all of whom concluded unanimously that terrorism will continue in the future and, in fact, could escalate dramatically.

In view of this trend, the Secretary of State assembled the Advisory Panel on Overseas Security, headed by Adm. Bobby Inman. The Inman Panel's focus was not only on the terrorist threat against U.S. personnel, but also against U.S. missions abroad. The Inman Panel found and concluded that nearly half of our missions abroad did not meet minimum security standards. During the course of its investigation, it also examined electronic penetration threats and came to the shocking conclusion that a number of our posts were rendered vulnerable. One post, for example, was found to share a common wall with an Eastern European trading company.

The report made it very clear that no matter how much money we spend, we obviously could not provide a 100-percent guarantee against such threats. But it did outline a number of measures that this Government could take that could minimize the probability of such threats and attacks against our personnel and our embassies abroad. Those measures are contained in titles I through IV of of this legislation.

The measures called for by the Inman Panel encompass more than just a major diplomatic building program. It also called for a major realignment of the security status within the Department of State. These measures are equally important to the building program. They call for such measures as improved training, increased personnel, the reorganization of the security structure within the Department of State, a system for personal accountability for security lapses, and the creation of a Bureau of Diplomatic Security.

The Department of State has already implemented many of the 91 recommendations proposed by the Inman Panel. But this legislation here today is required to further implement the remainder of the recommendations. The Inman Panel recommendations encompass not only physical security, but human security. Even the best built embassy cannot function without properly trained personnel.

This legislation addresses the growing problem of terrorism in a comprehensive way. That was the value of the Inman Panel report, so that we do not constantly respond to the threat of terrorism in a reactive and an uncoordinated way. This legislation has become a priority of the administration, it is a priority of the Foreign affairs Committee, and I hope it will be a priority not only of the House of Representatives, but the entire Congress.

If we delay action, there is no question that many Americans who work on behalf of the U.S. Government will remain at risk. Just a few weeks ago, terrorists attempted to smuggle a car bomb into the Embassy in Portugal. Fortunately, that Embassy had been designed and built in the last few years and had the necessary security standards in place. Alert security officials detected the bomb that had been placed under an Embassy employee's car. The car was evacuated, the bomb went off, but fortunately no damage was done to the Embassy and not one was hurt or killed.

The point is that the Embassy in Portugal is an exception to the rule. Had it been one of our missions or consulates that has been recommended for renovation, relocation or construction by the Inman Panel, there would have been a serious loss of life and a serious damage to property.

So, ladies and gentleman of the committee, this legislation is vital in all respects. It is an ambitious program, but one that has to be taken, not only because it is important to this country, but I think that we have to make a moral commitment and take responsibility for the people who work for the United States.

I would like to comment on one other provision in this legislation, and that is title VIII, the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act, which provides for education and medical benefits, and compensation to future hostages, as well as to hostage family members. It is based on the provisions in the Hostage Relief Act of 1980 that expired in 1983. This title will fill a serious void in our ability to combat and cope with international terrorism, and to minimize and alleviate the hardships on the family members, as well as the hostages. If there is anything we learned from the Iranian hostage crisis, it is that first and foremost in the minds of those hostages was concern for the health, welfare and safety of their family. This legislation would help them to cope better with a perilous situation and give them the kind of peace of mind they deserve during such an ordeal.

Title VIII not only provides compensation for future hostages, but it provides retroactively compensation for the hostages of the Iranian crisis. They still have not received any compensation, and yet 5 years has passed. It is long overdue. It is grossly overdue. And it is something that this Congress has to address here and now.

I might also mention that the Algiers agreement, which arranged the release of our hostages, denied these hostages the right to sue in court and to seek redress. So, at the minimum, we as a country have an obligation to provide the compensation that, as I said earlier, is long overdue.

We have a unique opportunity here today, ladies and gentlemen, to take strong action against international terrorism. I urge this body to approve overwhelmingly the legislation before us. We will not regret having done it.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986.

My colleagues from Florida DANTE FASCELL, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and DAN MICA, the chairman of the International Operations Subcommittee, and my colleagues from Michigan Maine, BILL BROOMFIELD and OLYMPIA SNOWE, the ranking minority members of the committee and subcommittee, are to be commended for their continuing concern and diligence to combat the increasing threat from international terrorists.

This bill is a sobering reminder of the threat terrorists pose to the security of our Nation. It provides for almost $3 billion in new budget authority over the next 6 years to enhance the security of our embassies and diplomatic missions overseas. We have had no choice but to assume a bunker mentality to protect American officials abroad.

During the past decade, terrorists have attacked U.S. officials or installations on the average of once every 17 days. Last year alone, 173 international terrorists incidents were directed at American individuals or facilities abroad, resulting in the death of 23 Americans and injuries to more than 150.

Although the United States remains the prime target of international terrorists, our allies are equally as vulnerable. Overall, there were 812 international terrorist incidents last year, claiming 926 lives and resulting in almost 1,300 injuries. Our Nation obviously cannot stand alone in the battle against terrorism.

In June 1984, I introduced legislation urging the President to organize an international convention to combat terrorism and to seek international agreements on the punishment and extradition of terrorists and their accomplices. I also urged increased cooperation among our allies in sharing intelligence information about terrorist organizations and in discussing counterterrorism strategy and techniques. The Foreign Affairs Committee included my legislation in a broader terrorism bill, which Congress approved and was signed into law by President Reagan in October 1984.

Vice President Bush's task force on terrorism recently endorsed my proposal, saying in his report released last month that, "International cooperation is crucial to long-term deterrence of terrorism."

There is a growing consensus in support of my effort to organize an international convention or working group on terrorism and I'm confident we are closer to the formation of such an organization. The legislation we consider today reaffirms the committee's belief in such a concept.

This legislation directs the President to establish an international coordinating committee, whose sole focus would be the problems and responses to international terrorism. It also seeks the help of our allies in protecting innocent Americans traveling abroad.

During the past 5 years, there have been more than 3,000 terrorist incidents worldwide, claiming hundreds of lives, causing thousands of injuries, and billions of dollars in damages. No nation is immune to the threat.

Our allies are looking to the United States for the leadership to organize an international working group to reduce the threat from terrorism. We must step forward and decisively take the lead in this effort so that we can at last begin an organized campaign to capture and prosecute terrorists. It's time that we put the terrorists and would-be terrorists of the world on notice that they will no longer be allowed to roam the world freely and that their crimes against humanity will no longer go unpunished.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YATRON], chairman of the Human Rights and International Organization Subcommittee.

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Florida for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the omnibus diplomatic security and antiterrorism bill.

I want to commend the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. FASCELL, the ranking minority member, Mr. BROOMFIELD, and in particular the chairman and ranking minority member of the International Operations Subcommittee, Mr. MICA and Ms. SNOWE, for the outstanding work they have done on this legislation. Their leadership has resulted in a bipartisan strategy to combat one of the greatest threats to the American people: international terrorism.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation will strengthen and enhance the President's ability to confront the menace of terrorism in a realistic way by using legal instruments and international law. This is a comprehensive bill which includes among its many important provisions authority to deal with international nuclear terrorism, U.S. port security, as well as procedures to combat narcotics-related terrorism. This commitment is reinforced with a much-needed diplomatic security package designed to provide protection for Americans serving abroad.

There has been a great deal of concern expressed throughout the country that the United States does not have an effective approach to combat international terrorism. While it would be unrealistic to expect the United States to totally eliminate this menace, the Congress and the administration have devoted coinsiderable time and effort to establishing a coherent antiterrorism policy, which is embodied in this legislation.

This bill reflects the President's commitment of combating terrorism. It will not eradicate the threat but it will serve as an effective deterrent. The United States must be prepared to provide security against terrorism for its own people. Clearly, no other nation can be expected to assume this responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, in light of budget constraints many of our colleagues have reservations about the diplomatic security package. I share those views, and I am confident that the appropriate steps have been taken to preclude cost overruns and fiscal mismanagement. The committee has gone to great lengths to reprioritize the over 250 projects which require security improvements to reflect the concerns many of us have about cost effectiveness. Further, this legislation requires the Secretary of State to provide the appropriate congressional committees with detailed justifications for every program and project.

Mr. Chairman, if we are serious about protecting our people against the scourge of terrorism, we must match our words with deeds and provide the President with the necessary resources and authority he needs to carry out this vitally important task.

In conclusion, this legislation can serve as a springboard toward greater international cooperation in combating a problem that threatens the future stability and welfare of every nation. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], a senior member of the minority.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am pleased to rise in strong support of H.R. 4151. The Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986. This bill is a monumental step forward in the protection of American citizens traveling or working abroad, and will ultimately lead to increased security for them at home, as well.

Over the past several years, the Congress has become more and more aware of the threat posed by international terrorism. The House has not shirked its duty to do everything in its power to give our executive branch effective weapons in the fight against terrorism. Everyone should understand that our fight against terrorism is not one dimensional. In this bill, as in previous legislation, we give emphasis both to unilateral and multinational approaches to the problem. As we struggle to understand the origins of terrorism, we realize that in many cases it results from the frustration of political aspirations which may in some cases be legitimate, or with which we can sympathize. But we must demonstrate our unshakable resolve to combat those who act out their frustrations by killing innocent men, women, and children, or by taking up arms against democratic governments and institutions.

This legislation was carefully crafted under the leadership of the distinguished chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD]. Major portions of this legislation—most notably the deplomatic security and hostage relief provisions—were drafted under the guidance of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] and the gentlelady from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], chairman and ranking minority member, respectively, of the Subcommittee on International Operations. Some of the provisions were contributed by other committees, such as the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, on which I also serve, which first acted on the hostage relief provisions, and which endorses this legislation. Other committees cooperating in this venture were the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Committee on the Judiciary. We thank them for their cooperation in this venture.

The bill begins with the authorization of a massive construction program to protect Americans serving their country abroad in the diplomatic and consular services and in the many other agencies which are housed in American missions abroad. It will create a new Bureau of Diplomatic Security, to strengthen 254 U.S. facilities overseas. A new Bureau of Diplomatic Security is created to centralize responsibility for security matters within the State Department. When security-related incidents occur abroad, boards of inquiry will examine our response and determine if any additional action or precautions are required.

The bill contains provisions for dealing with difficult problem of increasing security at foreign seaports, so that it will be harder to carry out terrorist attacks on Americans or others at sea. These provisions are modeled after the recently passed measure designed to beef up security at foreign airports, and include assessments of security at foreign seaports, backed up by the threat that travel advisories will be issued in the absence of progress.

Provisions aimed at dealing with the problem of nuclear terrorism are also featured in the bill are aimed mainly at stimulating international cooperation to deal with the awsome threat to civilization posed by the possibility that a Khaddafi or a Khomeini could get their hands on a nuclear device.

Americans traveling abroad often feel that they are threatened because their place of birth appears on their passports. We have included a provision aimed at stimulating international agreement on the deletion of this information as an item on most passport; we also state in our committee report that we expect the Secretary of State to use his existing authority to issue passports without place of birth information.

The bill at long last provides an adequate settlement for the hostages taken at our Embassy in Teheran, who have not, until this day, received their final compensation; it establishes a uniform, compassionate, and reasonable appropriate system for aid to any of our employees who may be taken hostage in the future, as well as for their families.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn to the provisions of title V of the bill. These provisions are especially important ones because they relate directly to actions which can be taken by our own State Department to help combat terrorism.

Section 501 provides for the establishment of a list of most-wanted international terrorists.

Section 502 increases the amount of rewards which may be offered for the capture of terrorists either on the list of most-wanted terrorists, or who are otherwise infamous.

Section 503 relates to rewards for information relating to international narcoterrorism and drug trafficking. The phenomenon of narcoterrorism is a relatively new one, but it is highly destructive. It involves the use of terroristic tactics against drug enforcement and diplomatic personnel—a new escalation in the criminality of narcotics traffickers.

The section is not intended to set up a program competing with the those under the jurisdiction of the DEA. Rather, the section is intended to provide additional weapons—in the form of rewards for the capture of the most major, infamous traffickers—which we hope will ordinarily be offered in cooperation with foreign countries. The provision specifies that in the case of rewards for the apprehension of narcotics traffickers, the Secretary of State is to act in consultation with the Attorney General. The section also provides for the offering of rewards for the capture or thwarting of actions directed against American personnel, or those who assist them abroad, or their families. We must do everything in our power to protect those individuals who risk their lives to keep our streets free of narcotics.

Section 504 provides for the improvement of the coordination of the antiterrorism assistance programs by the Secretary of State.

Section 505 authorizes up to $1 million annually of our antiterrorism assistance funds may be used to protect judges or informants who help us work against terrorists.

Section 506 provides that Congress should be notified when travel advisories are issued by our Government.

Section 507 is a sense of Congress provision stating that if a terrorist incident occurs abroad, and Libya or Iran support the terrorists, a travel advisory should be issued unless the Libyan or Iranian missions to that country are closed. In addition, the official missions of any other nation which uses its missions to support terrorism should be closed after an attack on Americans, on pain of the issuance of a travel advisory.

Section 508 is a consensus provision designed to prohibit the provision of services to the military, police, or intelligence services of countries on the terrorist list maintained under the Export Administration Act.

Section 509 would prohibit the export of any item on the U.S. munition list to any country on the terrorist list; it also provides that the President is to take all feasible steps to prohibit the export of goods or technology to a terrorist country if the Secretary of State determines that such exports would make a significant contribution to that country's military potential or enhance its ability to support international terrorism. The President is directed to take all feasible steps to secure the cooperation of other governments in efforts along the lines of the provisions of section 509.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill, are carefully designed and are the product of wise consultation within this House and with the executive branch. The bill is supported by the administration. I applaud the committee leadership on both sides of the aisle for its work on the bill and its cooperation in accommodating some concerns I raised—notably on the place-of-birth issue and the broadening of the Levine amendment now carried in section 507 of the bill.

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Oceanography.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4151.

For too long, too many innocent Americans have suffered injury or death at the hands of international terrorists.

Whoever said that one terrorist is another person's freedom fighter has a callous disregard for the real victims of international terrorism.

How an 11-year-old girl returning home for the holidays, a wheelchair-bound 72-year-old retiree on a vacation cruise, and a 23-year-old Navy diver on leave stood in the way of anyone's freedom is a mystery to me and every American.

We must no longer ignore the issues of terrorism. Seared in our memories are the bombings of our Marine barracks in Beirut, the tormenting of senior citizens held hostage on the Achille Lauro, and the Christmas-time machine gunnings at the Rome and Vienna Airports.

Congress must send a clear message to terrorists the world over that we will not tolerate the brutal acts by the bully-boys. This legislation does just that.

In addition to strengthening the physical security of our embassies and diplomatic posts, it also sets in motion a framework for maritime counterterrorism. I am very proud to say that I initiated this component calling for an international conference establishing seaport security and passenger safety. This grew out of listening to the Meskins family, a New Jersey couple who was held hostage on the Achille Lauro. They told us in grim detail how they were taunted and tormented by the terrorists and then described the final moments of Mr. Klinghoffer's life.

But even more shocking was how they described the lax procedures that allowed that to happen. No screening of bags, no screening of people, easy access to the vessel, and no one on board to fight back.

That is why my legislation calls for international standards and agreements.

This legislation would require participating nations to take tough steps to combat terrorists. It calls for seaport screening of cargo and baggage similar to that used at airports; it adds extra security to restrict access to cargo, dockside property and the ships themselves; and it calls for additional security personnel on board ships, like sea marshals, comparable to sky marshals.

Tourists used to ask, when planning a vacation, where will they go. Now they ask, will they be able to come back.

The maritime component of this legislation ensures that they will come back.

We ask the private sector to cooperate in this, for good security is good business.

In addition, this legislation also authorizes $125 million for the Coast Guard to add personnel to bolster its historic security role at our Nation's ports. It mandates a risk assessment for the Nation's ports and guarantees that we will deter saboteurs at every wharf, warehouse, and dock.

Mr. Chairman, I want to conclude by saying that every now and again in this House we get to do something that we are so very proud of and work on a bipartisan basis. Today, united as one Nation and one Congress, we say "No" to the bullies.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN], who is a member of the subcommittee which reported this bill to the committee for consideration.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the efforts of Chairmen FASCELL and MICA, along with Mr. BROOMFIELD and Ms. SNOWE for their work on this legislation.

I would also like to mention the fine work of the Secretary of State's Advisory Panel on Overseas Security, Chaired by Adm. Bobby Inman. The recommendations of this panel were the basis of the diplomatic security section, titles I–IV, of this bill. I would like to thank Chairman MICA for the inclusion of my language to limit appropriations for a fiscal year so that they may not exceed the amounts specified for such program in the Department of State's budget in brief for fiscal year 1987 (title IV, section 401(a)).

We must be careful not to allow this bill to become a permanent budget item. It must be a one-time authorization. Too many Government programs are supposed to last for a short period of time, yet seem to develop lives of their own.

I would like to call the committee's attention to title VII, section 701, Consideration of International Terrorism at the Tokyo Economic Summit Conference, language which I included during consideration by the committee. Last year, Abu Abbas, who was responsible for planning the Achille Lauro Hijacking, escaped justice in two foreign nations. This section will attempt to ensure that such a travesty is never repeated. It seeks to have terrorism included for discussion at the Tokyo Summit. In addition, it directs President Reagan to expand the Agreed Statement of the Seven Industrialized Nations made at the 1978 Bonn Conference regarding aircraft hijacking.

That declaration of policy must include all hijackers, not just those of aircraft. Those who plan the hijackings must also be brought to justice. Finally, this language seeks to expand the range of sanctions imposed on nations that evade their responsibility to the civilized world by coddling terrorists.

Later, I will be introducing two amendments to title VIII, Victims of Terrorism Compensation. When this matter was first considered by the Committee on Foregin Affairs last year, it had several major flaws: It did not cover members of the U.S. Armed Services, it allowed for different rates of compensation, and set the rate of compensation at a base far beyond historical or responsible levels. We were able to correct the most blatant of these by extending protection to members of the armed services along with civilian Government employees. However, there are still problems which should be addressed.

This legislation sets up a program resembling an entitlement, so we must proceed with caution and base our deliberations upon fact not emotion. My first amendment will delete Presidential discretion for degrees of treatment or harshness. The experience of being held captive by an enemy government or group is not pleasant, but it is not possible to objectively determine what constitutes fair or unfair treatment for purposes of compensation. We are not discussing payment for physical or psychological injuries, we are talking about a cash payment on top of salaries and other benefits.

My second amendment sets a lower base rate of payment. As written, this title would provide a payment based on the worldwide average per diem rate, roughly $60 to $70 a day. There is no logical, historical or economic basis for this figure. American P.O.W.'s from World War II, Korea and Vietnam were not given anywhere near this amount. President Carter's Commission on Hostage Compensation did not recommend anything close to this number or formula. I believe my amendment which sets the base rate at $20 a day is fair, equitable and fiscally responsible.

During consideration of these amendments, I intend to present supporting information on these points.

The information on these points, Mr. Chairman, will be not from just my experience nor the time that I have spent on issues such as these, but will be based on the President's Commission that President Carter appointed in 1980 to try to set about finding a fair and equitable compensation for the Iranian hostages. Their conclusions were dramatically different from the legislation as it is presently written. Later on I will go into the membership of that Commission, and their recommendations.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON], a very active member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am especially pleased to see the inclusion in this Omnibus Anti-Terrorism Act of a provision that directs the President to include the subject of international terrorism on the agenda of the upcoming Tokyo economic summit, to seek the establishment of an international antiterrorism coordinating committee and a provision that urges the President to seek international agreement on the sharing of information on passports and visas in order to more effectively combat terrorism.

The President, and indeed all of us who meet with our allies, should take advantage of every opportunity to raise this issue and to seek their greater cooperation in the crucial battle against international terrorism, because the only way we can hope to put a halt to this scourge is by a vigorous and coordinated campaign by all those countries who have an interest in denying the terrorists safe haven and financial or political support.

It is not enough for our friends and allies in the world to offer their verbal support for our antiterrorism policy, they must be willing to take economic and political steps to make this world a very difficult place for a terrorist to live in. So I urge my colleagues to lend their support to this measure before us today as an encouragement to the President to seek the international cooperation that is needed to combat terrorism.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the chairman, Mr. FASCELL of Florida, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee for his excellent work in bringing this bill before the House. Also Mr. BROOMFIELD, Mr. MICA, the subcommittee chairman, and Ms. SNOWE, the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee for International Operations of that committee.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. SMITH], in a colloquy about H.R. 4151 and particularly section 503. I am deeply concerned about the ever-growing number of terrorist activities occurring overseas, and in fact the efforts of my colleague, Mr. SMITH of Florida, as chairman of the Task Force on International Narcotics, has brought the necessary attention to the seriousness of the narcotics problem throughout the world.

However, I have some reservations regarding the language as mentioned in H.R. 4151 pertaining to international narcoterrorism and drug trafficking. In particular, section 503.

Because of these reservations, many of which have been brought to me by the Drug Enforcement Administration, our Nation's leading drug enforcement agency, I would like to enter into a colloquy with my friend and distinguished colleague on this section.

Mr. SMITH, in section 503 of H.R. 4151, do we set up a parallel or duplicate program, one which is already under the jurisdiction of the Drug Enforcement Administration?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, it was clearly not the intention of the committee to set up an informant system for the State Department to rival or compete with that of the DEA. The Secretary's authority is limited to information rewards on major narcotices terrorist-type traffickers for offenses committed outside the United States. Mostly as we anticipate acts committed against people who have committed crimes against Embassy personnel or people involved in eradication programs or other forms of narcotics where terrorism is involved.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. As you know, the Drug Enforcement Agency is this Nation's leading drug authority, both at home and also abroad. As you mentioned, are we not establishing another information reward system through the State Department when we already have one set up with the DEA?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, the purpose of this amendment is not to put the State Department in the business of narcotics enforcement overseas. That is not the intention of this section of the bill. The purpose is to give the Secretary of State the ability to fight fire with fire when United States Embassy officials and employees, contract employees, such as the 20 Peruvian eradication workers who were murdered last year, are killed or kidnapped by what we know to be drug kingpins who are engaged in terrorist activity.

Unfortunately, under the current provisions of the State Department authorization bill, that drug activity is not considered to be terrorist in nature.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. If the gentleman would further explain, I have a concern and a concern of many people at this point in time. We have created an atmosphere of informants and of cooperating individuals with our various reward system as stated.

Are we setting up a situation where these informants and these individuals would shop around, so to speak, for the best deal? How do we protect ourselves from this shopping around?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, the Secretary of State, as you know, under the terms of the bill must consult with the Attorney General before making any rewards at all.

Second, I doubt, and I think the committee doubts that people like Carlos Lehder or others of that ilk that are trafficking and engaging in terrorist activities are going to shop to be informants.

Third, this provision is not intended to enable the State Department to pay rewards to DEA informants but really to public informants. That is what we are looking to get. The whole purpose of it is to make the traffickers scared that people will be paid to turn them in, and where they are getting support because they are paying people, we are going to do the same thing to them.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Can the gentleman assure this gentleman that in the final analysis the bill, in passage of the bill that we will not have a parallel system?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, I have told the gentleman and the others who have concerns about this we do not want a parallel system, and right now language is being prepared by the agencies who are involved, Justice, DEA, and State to take care of this problem, if any exists, and at some stage in this proceeding in the Senate, in conference, wherever, if the language is agreed to and can help fix this, we will put it in to ensure that the gentleman's concerns are taken care of.

I thank the gentleman for his help in this matter.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, international terrorism poses a complex, dangerous threat for which there is no quick or easy solution. But the omnibus antiterrorism legislation before us today will significantly improve our capability for combating terrorism.

As we have become all too aware, terrorist attacks are growing at an average annual rate of about 12 to 15 percent, and have become an ever-present threat throughout the world. Most recently, the hijackers of the cruise ship Achille Lauro brutally slayed Leon Klinghoffer, a partially paralyzed New York appliance shop owner on the trip as a 36th wedding anniversary present to his wife.

This terrible tragedy was allowed to happen largely because of inadequate security at one of the Achille Lauro's ports of call. The lack of baggage checks and passenger screening at Genoa appears to have enabled the hijackers to smuggle the weapons on board that made it much easier for them to take control of the ship.

Preflight screening of passengers and their carryon baggage is the cornerstone of our domestic aircraft security program. Since 1972, these procedures have detected over 30,000 firearms, and have resulted in 13,000 arrests. Recent terrorist acts against passenger airplanes and cruise ships point out the need for us to continually monitor and update our security procedures. This is especially true at ports and on board ships, where there are presently no international or federally prescribed security measures. As a result, many ports have no baggage or personnel screening at all. In many places, completely unrestricted access to passenger and cruise vessels provides ample opportunity for terrorists to perform their evil deeds.

I am pleased that the Foreign Affairs Committee decided to incorporate into the omnibus antiterrorism bill before us legislation which I introduced, to authorize the Secretary of Transportation to require stringent international maritime safeguards. These include the use of metal detectors, cargo and baggage screening, and other comprehensive safety measures for all passenger ships leaving American ports for international waters.

The bill would also require the State Department to assess the effectiveness of security measures at those foreign ports that pose a high risk of terrorist attacks on passenger vessels, to notify foreign governments if security is inadequate, and to issue an immediate travel advisory if the port is not brought up to standard. In addition, the President must suspend service between the United States and any foreign nation that provides sanctuary to terrorist organizations which seize passenger vessels.

Of particular importance is a provision in the measure that urges the President to seek agreement through the International Maritime Organization on matters of seaport and seaboard security, and to submit to Congress a report on progress in developing measures to prevent terrorist acts against crews and passengers aboard ships. Cooperation with host government is essential, since they have the primary responsibility for providing security for U.S. citizens and facilities abroad. Securing the cooperation of the civilized nations of the world in applying political or economic pressures on those lands that sponsor terrorism is a difficult yet vital part of an overall antiterrorism program.

Mr. Chairman, dealing effectively with terrorism requires long-term measures to protect passengers and cargo, and to train security personnel. We in the free world must work together to gather and share intelligence so that we may put an end, once and for all, to these terrorist threats. The bill we are considering today incorporates these essential elements. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this needed legislation to reduce the risks of terrorism.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

□ 1720

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

This is basically a good bill. It does many excellent things to control terrorism and protect Americans against terrorism.

The problem I have with the bill is that it takes a direct end run around both the budget process and Gramm-Rudman. I think we need to be concerned in this House when we bring legislative to the floor that we live within the strictures that we have mandated on ourselves trying to move toward a balanced budget in 1991. That is the problem with this bill. It is an attempt to get out from underneath the balanced budget law and do an end run around the process.

What we are creating here is a new authorization. The new authorization is entirely correct. It is a way of attempting to find out or establish a method for getting at payment in compensation to hostages and people held by terrorists.

The problem is that we also set up in doing so an entitlement program, a brandnew entitlement program. That is done in violation of the budget bill. It is done in violation of Gramm-Rudman, and I have to say it is done knowingly, because the rule that brought it to the floor waived the provisions of Gramm-Rudman in order to get the bill out here.

Now, what we need to do is look at correcting that particular problem.

Now, let us understand what it is we are doing here. First of all, with regard to pay and benefits, as mentioned in the authorization bill, we are continuing the pay and benefits people would get anyway. Those are already authorized and appropriated. We would not in any way impinge upon people getting their pay by taking out the entitlement. It is already provided for in the appropriation; so the pay that either goes to families or to individuals which will continue to flow because that is already appropriated for and would be under any circumstances.

What we are talking about here is an add-on program to provide medical and educational benefits to hostages and hostage families, as well as cash compensation and the cash compensation has to come within 1 year to former captives.

We do that as an entitlement program. We do it right up front as an entitlement program.

Now, I heard the arguments out here that somehow we have not been able to react in the past. Well, we have never had an authorization in the past. There has been no program for doing this. We have never authorized such a program before. We have never had a mechanism.

Why can we not at least try, once we have the mechanism in place, to do the job of appropriating annually?

I would say to the people who suggest that the Iranian hostages have not been compensated, they are absolutely correct. There was no such program for the Iranian hostages; but if we had that program in place and you brought a supplemental appropriation to this floor in the midst of the crisis, it would pass like that. There would be no problem getting that done in the midst of the crisis. Why do this end run? Why can we not at least try the regular process? If the regular process does not work, then go to the entitlement; but why do we have to start with the entitlement? Why go that route right away?

It seems to me at the very least we ought to be out here protecting the process that we have put in place. That is what I am asking for in the amendment that I will offer. It is no way impacts on the authorization process. It keeps the authorization process in place. It simply says, "Don't go to an entitlement now. Make the money a part of the regular appropriation process. Say to us that we are going to have to come up with the money as a part of our effort to get to a balanced budget." That is all my amendment will do. It will keep the authorization program established in this bill absolutely in place. It will simply set up a different mechanism for payment that says that Congress ought to vote the money before we pay the money and it seems to me in light of the budget problems this country faces, voting the money before we pay the money makes pretty good sense.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], the chairman of the African Subcommittee.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to pay tribute to both the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], and also to the ranking member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], and to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], the ranking member of the subcommittee, for developing this excellent legislative product.

I would like to take just a moment to draw the attention of my colleagues to title VI of the omnibus antiterrorism legislation that we are now considering. Title VI embodies legislation that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] and I had introduced, and focuses specifically on actions to prevent or deter acts of international nuclear terrorism. As many of my colleagues know, this is an issue I have been extremely concerned about for several years and therefore I am particularly delighted to see our committee and this body assert needed leadership on what is surely one of the most serious of all pending threats to our national security—the prospect of terrorists going nuclear.

There may be some who consider this a farfetched or unlikely scenario. But to those individuals, I say "please think again." Anybody who believes that terrorists cannot acquire the technical information necessary to build a nuclear weapon has not thumbed through a recent encyclopedia or basic college physics text. And surely events of the past several years leave no doubt that terrorist fanatics clearly possess sufficient ruthlessness and cunning to carry off a nuclear attack.

The fact is that it only takes three things to construct a nuclear weapon: First, the technological know-how; second, as little as 20 pounds of a nuclear explosive material; and third, a political decision to put the first two together.

Title 6 provides for very modest and minimal steps that must be taken if we hope to stave off the day when terrorists groups acquire a nuclear explosive.

Obviously, this effort will require extensive international cooperation, so title 6 directs the President to seek universal adherence to the Convention on the Physical Security of Nuclear Material. Further, it asks the President to work with our allies and other countries to minimize the amount of nuclear explosive material in international transit and to insure the most stringent of security conditions for any such shipments. With incidents of international terrorism so clearly on the rise, these efforts to keep nuclear weapons grade material out of circulation and out of the hands of terrorist groups takes on an added urgency. This title also directs the President to seek agreement within the U.N. Security Council on an effective international strategy to deter nations or subnational groups from engaging in acts of nuclear terrorism and to respond on a coordinated, international basis should such a catastrophe occur. The final provision I would like to highlight seeks to strengthen the role of the Department of Defense in assuring that the physical protection standards applied to all exports or subsequent transfers of special nuclear material are fully adequate to deter theft, sabotage, or any other act of terrorism which would result in the diversion of that material. We cannot afford to settle for any lesser standard when the stakes are so terribly high.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, before I reserve the balance of my time, I want to indicate that the Vice President sent me a letter where he headed up the President's committee on combating terrorism and he indicated today in a letter to me that he wanted me to know how much he appreciated our committee's prompt and bipartisan action on the legislative recommendation of the Vice President's Task Force on Combating Terrorism.

He said:

> Inasmuch as this report was publicly released on March 6, 1986, it is particularly gratifying to see such quick action. I know you have worked closely with the chairman on this legislation. It has been truly a bipartisan effort that reflects close cooperation and this will become a major part of our overall program to combat international terrorism.
> I urge speedy enactment of the legislation that is necessary to complete this important work.

Signed: GEORGE BUSH, Vice President.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr.

BARNES], the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank our distinguished chairman of the committee for yielding me this time. I want to commend his leadership and that of the Republicans on the committee with whom we worked with very closely.

This is an enormously important piece of legislation.

I want to pick up on the comments of my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], with whom I had the privilege of working and offering some of the language with respect to nuclear terrorism.

If you think about it for a minute, given the amount of weapons grade material that exists in the world and the shipments of it that take place constantly around the world, it is almost inevitable that at some point some terrorist or terrorist organization will obtain enough of that material to put together a nuclear weapon and threaten civilization with the ultimate terrorism, and that is the threat of a nuclear weapon being exploded in an urban area.

It is almost inevitable that that will happen unless we get very tough about the way we deal with weapons grade materials and unless we get very tough in the standards that we establish for the transfer of those materials.

If it ever happens, if 1 year from now or 10 years from now or 30 years from now some terrorist gets hold of a nuclear weapon, everyone in the world is going to point at us, the people who were in office when the decisions were made about how these materials are transported and how they are used, and say, "How come you didn't do everything humanly possible to make sure that this couldn't happen, that a terrorist organization or a terrorist state could not get access to nuclear weapons?"

Well, we have the opportunity today to take some very modest steps. Quite frankly, a number of us wanted to do more to make our procedures even stronger with respect to the handling of weapons grade materials; but at least this legislation takes some first steps and assures that we are moving in the right direction toward doing what needs to be done to make it impossible for terrorists to get hold of nuclear material, plutonium and other weapons grade material, that potentially someday could threaten the civilized world with the ultimate danger, nuclear terrorism.

I strongly urge bipartisan support for this legislation. It is terribly important that we begin the effort of insuring that that day will never come.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4151, as amended the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act. Events over the past several years, culminating in the unprecedented act of high seas terror against U.S. civilians who were cruising the Mediterranean Sea aboard the Italian vessel, the Achille Lauro, necessitate immediate legislative action. Any delay, by the United States, in acting can only serve to convince the faceless jackals who prey on the innocent, that they can continue to violate the most basic rules of a civilized society with complete impunity.

Last fall, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries initiated hearings and investigations into the threat of terrorism in the maritime sector. We considered safety on board passenger vessels and critical cargo carriers plus port security, both domestic and foreign. At our urging, there has been included within the text of the measure before the House, those measures we feel must be enacted. In addition, as a result of the examination of the data collected during our investigations, an amendment was offered during markup in the Committee on Foreign Affairs that would allow the U.S. Coast Guard to better carry out its responsibilities in respect to the assessment and containment of the risk of terrorism.

Clearly, within this vital legislation, and more particularly, within title IX are matters of vital concern to our committee. Their enactment will have a continuing impact on programs and agency responsibilities within our jurisdiction. In the interest of speed, we chose not to markup a bill of our own. Instead, it was our responsibility as well as our pleasure, to participate in the drafting of legislative as well as report language. In recognition of our joint roles in bringing this legislation to the Committee on Rules as well as to the floor of the House, Chairman FASCELL and I exchanged letters, copies of which I would ask be included in the RECORD of these proceedings, at this time. Once again, I applaud the Committee on Foreign Affairs and its chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, for coordinating the efforts of the several committees involved in the process of bringing this vital legislative package to the House.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I commend this legislation to the Members of this body, and urge your yes vote for this measure, which will send a strong positive signal that the United States means business.

I include the following correspondence:

COMMITTEE ON
MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES,
Washington, DC, March 12, 1986.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I would like to congratulate you on bringing the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986 to the House in such an expeditious manner. It was indeed a pleasure to cooperate with your Committee on those matters over which this Committee has sincere concern and jurisdiction.

As you know, our Subcommittee on Merchant Marine held extensive hearings, both in Washington and at Florida ports that are dominant in the cruise passenger trade, following the ACHILLE LAURO incident. Based upon these investigations, the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine recommended that certain steps be taken to better prepare the United States and its citizens against the threat of terrorism on the high seas and in ports. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries wholeheartedly supports these recommendations that are now included in Title IX of the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986.

Because of the urgency of the matters contained within this bill, we have agreed to forego further consideration of those measures within the joint jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the agreed understanding that subsequent legislation and oversight dealing with matters of maritime security, such as contained within Title IX of the bill, are indeed within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. During the debate on the bill, I intend to engage you in a colloquy concerning jurisdictional questions.

Once again, please accept my congratulations and appreciation for the spirit of cooperation between our Committees that has allowed this vital measure to proceed so rapidly through the legislative process.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WALTER B. JONES,
Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, March 12, 1986.

Hon. WALTER B. JONES,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of March 12 regarding the maritime issues contained within the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-terrorism Act of 1986. I concur wholeheartedly in your observations; more specifically, there are measures of jurisdiction exclusive to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries within this bill, most particularly the U.S. Coast Guard provisions and the Panama Canal provision. The other issues contained within Title IX are, indeed, matters of joint concern to our Committees, and it is with great appreciation that I note the singular contributions made by your Committee in making the investigations and in the drafting of the language for much of the maritime security title.

Rest assured that I will support your continued jurisdiction over those matters contained within the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-terrorism Act of 1986 that are generally referenced in the Rules of the House of Representatives, Rule X, clause 1 (n) and to this end I would welcome the opportunity to discuss this during debate.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4418, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986. As we all know the incidence of terrorist acts has reached epidemic proportions, and most often, it is the United States and its citizens who are the primary targets.

I was very pleased to work with the Foreign Affairs Committee in developing title IX of this bill on maritime security and to cosponsor the bill as reported by that committee. The hijacking of the Italian cruise liner Achille Lauro and the subsequent murder by the terrorists of Leon Klinghoffer, an American citizen, highlighted the fact that the maritime environment is also vulnerable to terrorist attack.

The Merchant Marine Subcommittee, which I chair, has been actively involved in investigating maritime security. Subsequent to the Achille Lauro hijacking, on October 22, 1985, the subcommitte held a hearing on security in U.S. ports and on vessels using U.S. ports. This hearing was followed by field investigation of security at the Port of Miami and Port Everglades, FL, in November 1985. These ports handle the majority of cruise ship operations in the United States.

Extensive discussions were held with several Government agencies, including the Coast Guard, which is responsible for port and vessel safety, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which is responsible for domestic security in general. The subcommittee also met with many representatives of the cruise ship companies operating out of U.S. ports.

These companies, as well as officials from the ports, reported on the security measures already in place and on additional measures being tested and implemented in the aftermath of the Achille Lauro hijacking. Security measures being tested or implemented include: First, further restricting access by the public to the ports and vessels; second, increasing security personnel; third, screening passengers, baggage, and supplies with weapon-detecting equipment; fourth, screening shoreside personnel and crews; and fifth, restricting or eliminating visitors' access to vessels. It was evident from this investigation that security was being increased voluntarily and that the ports and cruise ship operators were committed to continuing that process.

The one question that could not be answered by anyone involved, however, was exactly what is the level of threat from acts of terrorism to U.S. ports and vessels using our ports. When the idea of an omnibus terrorism bill was proposed, the subcommittee felt that the issue of risk from terrorist acts had to be addressed before a comprehensive legislative scheme was developed. In the bill, as reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee, I am pleased to state the subcommittee's concern is alleviated by requiring the Secretary of Transportation to report to Congress on the level of threat to U.S. ports and vessels using those ports.

I am also pleased that the vital role the U.S. Coast Guard plays in domestic maritime security has been recognized in H.R. 4418. During the Foreign Affairs Committee markup, Congressman GERRY STUDDS, a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and chairman of the Coast Guard and Navigation Subcommittee of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, offered an amendment that was accepted by the Foreign Affairs Committee. The Studds amendment authorizes the Coast Guard to undertake activities to bolster security at domestic ports. This amendment is vitally important because of the severe cuts in the Coast Guard budget over the last several years. I commend Congressman STUDDS for its introduction and am very pleased it was well received by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

I would like to point out that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has jurisdiction over U.S. ports and foreign and domestic vessels using those ports. The expedited time schedule for considering an omnibus terrorism bill, however, required that the committee work through the Foreign Affairs Committee to develop those sections relating to maritime security.

The risk assessment report and the legislative proposals required of the Secretary of Transportation contained in H.R. 4418 concern domestic security at U.S. ports and on vessels using our ports. Domestic maritime security falls solely within the jurisdiction of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. These reports should be referred solely to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. Our committee, of course, will give serious consideration to the Secretary's report and any legislative proposals when they are received, and will develop legislation as necessary.

Again, I would like to commend the Foreign Affairs Committee for their cooperation with the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee on this issue. I believe title IX on maritime security is a reasoned and prudent approach to the very serious problem of terrorism in the marine environment. I support H.R. 4418 and I urge my colleagues to support it as well.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the Narcotics Task Force.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to explain section 503 of this bill, which I sponsored in committee as the chairman of the International Narcotics Task Force.

Basically, this section would expand the authority in the existing law to give information rewards on terrorists acts, to apply to narcoterrorist and major narcotics trafficking acts as well.

Since this provision tracks existing law very closely, let me review that law briefly before explaining section 503.

Current law—section 36 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act—provides that the Secretary of State, after consulting with the Attorney General, may pay rewards to an individual who furnishes information leading to the arrest or conviction of anyone engaged in an act of international terrorism, if that act is against a U.S. person or U.S. property and is outside U.S. territorial jurisdiction. A $5 millon fund was established to pay such information rewards. Similar legislation permits the Attorney General to pay such rewards domestically.

Section 503 amends current law—section 36—to permit the Secretary of State to provide information rewards leading to the arrest or conviction of individuals involved in narcoterrorist and narcotics trafficking acts, to be provided under the same conditions as in current law.

It would also increase the current $5 million fund to $10 millon; of that amount, $5 million would be an earmark available only for narcoterrorist/narcotics trafficking rewards.

Narcoterrorism is defined as the killing or kidnaping of a U.S. officer, employee or contractor—or member of their immediate family—while engaged in drug enforcement overseas. Information for rewards on narcotics trafficking would be limited to major traffickers. A report to the Congress would be required for any information rewards paid.

I would like to emphasize why this amendment is necessary. First and foremost, violence is increasing against U.S. officials and contractors engaged in narcotics enforcement overseas. Not only DEA agents are threatened by this violence, such as our agent who was murdered in Mexico. Peruvian eradication workers have been tortured and killed. In some countries, traffickers have put a price tag on all U.S. officials. We have United States State Department contract workers who are exposed to great danger in places like Tingo Maria, Peru, and Cochabamba, Bolivia, places we have never been but places where we have people helping us eradicate the terrible problem of drugs in this country. AID offices have been attacked by hired thugs, hired by narcotics traffickers, and certainly, as many of us are aware, narcotics traffickers are using the money that they get from selling narcotics to buy weapons to fund terrorists, and terrorists are entering into narcotics trafficking to get money to buy weapons and further their own terrorist activities.

However, the State Department now does not consider such acts to fall under the definition of international terrorism, and the Secretary, therefore, has no authority to offer these rewards.

Second, there are major narcotics traffickers against whom it would be impossible to prove that they have been involved in killing U.S. citizens, but who nonetheless finance and encourage such acts, as well as export huge quantities of drugs to the United States. There is currently no authority to provide information rewards on the Carlos Lehders and Pablo Escobars of the world. This amendment would provide that authority to the Secretary.

Finally, I would note that this provision has been approved by both the Office of Management and Budget and The White House. I think it will prove a very useful tool in our fight against narcotics—if the drug traffickers can put a price on our officials' heads, why shouldn't we be able to strike back by putting a price on their heads?

I would like to acknowledge that this provision stems from legislation originally introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS] which I cosponsored. I believe his concerns have been met by the colloquy that we entered into previously and I certainly urge adoption of this legislation, which includes his provision.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to personally thank the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], whose work on this over the years has been so intense, now culminating in this very fine bipartisan piece of legislation. I would certainly like to commend the chairman and his ranking member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] who have worked so hard together to bring this to fruition.

As a member of the International Operations Subcommittee, I would like to commend both Chairman DAN MICA, a good friend of mine and a fellow Floridian, and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], who have both worked so hard and so effectively to bring what is an excellent piece of legislation to the floor.

If there was ever a bipartisan piece of legislation that directly answers the problems by giving the tools to our enforcement people in the field, this is it. This is the kind of thing that brings this House to its finest hours, and I am really proud to be part of this effort. I commend all of those who have taken part.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act. When taken together with title V of the International Security and Development Act of 1985, the measure before us today provides an important corollary to our recent legislative efforts to combat aviation terrorism. As was the case with last year's bill, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and his committee members have made an immeasurable contribution to this omnibus antiterrorism bill.

The airport security measure signed into law on August 8, 1985, specifically requires the U.S. Secretary of Transportation to conduct periodic assessments of the effectiveness of security measures at foreign airports receiving international air service from the United States, using, at a minimum, internationally accepted standards.

If security deficiencies are found and not remedied within 90 days, the traveling public must be notified by DOT and by the airlines. Furthermore, in situations where a threat exists to the safety and security of passengers and flight crew members, the Secretary of Transportation is explicitly authorized to immediately suspend air service from that foreign airport to the United States.

Oversight hearings on DOT's implementation of our foreign airport security provisions were held just last month by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. At that time, 50 foreign airports had been evaluated against ICAO's standards and found to comply. Reassessments of these airports will be made three to six times a year.

In addition to sanctions or suspension of service, our recent enactment directs our Government to work through ICAO and other international negotiations to strengthen security standards and to improve enforcement of these standards. It also authorizes $5 million in fiscal year 1986 from the aviation trust fund for research and development of improved devices and techniques for detecting weapons and explosives. A total of $15 million was appropriated for this purpose in the fiscal year 1986 CR.

Today, U.S. scheduled airlines will transport more than 1 million passengers on 15,000 daily flights covering almost 400 airports in the United States and about 100 other points abroad. Since the inception of our current domestic airline passenger screening procedures in 1973, over 6 billion persons have been screened and almost 8 billion carry-on items have been inspected. These screening and inspection procedures have detected over 33,000 firearms with almost 14,000 associated arrests. Since late June, regulatory actions by the DOT have improved baggage and cargo inspections and security, expanded U.S. flight crew security training and increased the number of air marshals.

In closing, let me also briefly mention our hostages who are still being held in Lebanon. Some of these Americans have been held more than 1 year now, and public interest in their plight has risen and fallen over that time. We must maintain our high level of concern and interest. We must never forget that when we discuss laws and regulations about terrorism that the lives of many individuals are at stake; and that among those individuals are our hostages William Buckley, Peter Kilburn, Father Lawrence Jenco, Terry Anderson, David Jacobson, Thomas Suterland, and Alec Collett.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of H.R. 4151, I rise in support of this legislation which will provide for a significant increase in security for U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities, and operations, and for other purposes. Although the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation has limited jurisdiction over matters contained in H.R. 4151, we do have exclusive jurisdiction over section 409 of the bill relating to protection of foreign missions in the Washington, DC, metropolitan area, as well as foreign missions in the United States where there are located 20 or more missions and when such protective need arises in association with a permanent mission to an international organization.

Mr. Chairman, security for foreign missions in the United States is vital, through reciprocity, in obtaining needed security for American missions around the world, and is provided under two statutory programs. The first, a title III program for diplomatic protection in Washington, DC, is carried out by the U.S. Secret Service Uniformed Division and diplomatic protection with missions associated with the United Nations is carried out by the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service. The second is the Foreign Missions Act, which generally authorizes protective services for all diplomatic missions by the Secretary of State in order to meet current protective needs, except that the Secretary may not provide any protective services for which authority exists to provide such services under sections 202(7) and 208 of title III.

Mr. Chairman, title III of the United States Code directs the U.S. Secret Service Uniformed Division, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, to provide protection for the following: First, the White House in the District of Columbia; second, any building in which Presidential offices are located; third, the President and members of his immediate family; fourth, foreign diplomatic missions located in the metropolitan area of the District of Columbia; fifth, the temporary official residence of the Vice President and grounds in the District of Columbia; sixth, the Vice President and members of his immediate family; seventh, foreign diplomatic missions located in metropolitan areas—other than the District of Columbia—in the United States where there are located 20 or more such missions headed by full-time officers, except that such protection shall be provided only, first, on the basis of extraordinary protective need; second, upon request of the affected metropoiitan area; and third, when the extraordinary protective need arises in association with a visit to or occurs at a permanent mission to an international organization of which the United States is a member or an observer mission invited to participate in the work of such organization, provided that such protection may be provided for motorcades and at other places associated with such a visit and may be extended at places of temporary domicile in connection with such a visit; and eighth, foreign diplomatic missions located in such areas in the United States, its territories and possessions, as the President, on a case-by-case basis, may direct.

In carrying out functions of providing security for foreign diplomatic missions located in metropolitan areas—other than the District of Columbia—the Secretary of Treasury may utilize, with their consent, on a reimbursable basis, the services, personnel, equipment, and facilities of State and local governments, and is authorized to reimburse such State and local governments for the utilization of such services, personnel, equipment, and facilities. The authority of this subsection may be transferred by the President to the Secretary of State. To carry out this provision, there is authorized to be appropriated on an annual basis $7 million for the payment of reimbursement obligations entered into for security measures.

To date, the U.S. Secret Service has resisted any attempts by the State Department to provide protective services outside of Washington, DC. Further, Executive Order 12478 of May 23, 1984, transferred authority to the Secretary of the State to provide protective services under title III when associated with an international organization or on a case-by-case basis as the President may direct. The U.S. Secret Service Uniformed Division retained authority to provide protective services in the Washington metropolitan area.

In 1975, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs amended the Foreign Missions Act whereby the State Department was granted authority to provide extraordinary protective services for foreign missions directly, by contract, or through State or local authorities to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary in carrying out the act; however, such services shall not be provided if such authority exists under title III. There is authorized to be appropriated $2.5 million annually to carry out the purposes of the act.

Section 409 of H.R. 4151 will bolster State Department antiterrorism programs that provide security protection for the United Nations and United Nations related activities now carried out under title III by the Department of State, pursuant to Executive Order 12478, dated May 23, 1984. This section would significantly strengthen the range of authorities available for U.N. protection under title III by including the protective provisions now available through the Foreign Mission Act. This would include, among other provisions, the authority to effect the location of foreign missions based on security concerns, the ability to provide protection for activities that occur away from but are related to U.N. mission activities, provide protection against hostile activities that occur near the U.N. headquarters, allow the Attorney General to engage the judicial process on behalf of foreign missions and other important and useful authorities. This section will accomplish these goals without any increase in funds.

To conclude, the decision to provide protective services and the funding available therefore are both determined under title III, and provisions of the Foreign Mission Act may be used in support thereof.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of H.R. 4151.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill and commend the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida, for bringing it to the floor so expeditiously.

Mr. Chairman, this bill reflects the collective efforts of several committees of the House including the Committee on the Judiciary, in response to our leadership's call for an omnibus bill to deal with the threat of international terrorism. Those participating in this effort should be congratulated for the promptness and thoroughness of their response.

The bill accomplishes several important goals. It provides for greater security for our embassies overseas by authorizing new construction to strengthen U.S. facilities abroad against terrorist attacks. It establishes criminal penalties for Americans who supply military or intelligence assistance to avowedly terrorist nations. It tightens export controls on weapons and other technology which could be of great assistance to individuals, organizations, or countries engaged in or supporting terrorist activities against Americans or U.S. Government facilities.

The bill also authorizes rewards for information leading to the arrest and conviction of persons who kill or kidnap U.S. officials engaged in drug enforcement overseas, and it establishes a most-wanted list of international terrorists and a worldwide counterterrorism witness protection fund. It calls for travel advisories for nations which fail to close Libyan or Iranian official diplomatic missions in cases where these two countries provide support to terrorists who have attacked American citizens.

The bill also improves security safeguards at foreign ports and bolsters protection against nuclear terrorism.

Importantly, the bill further establishes a fund to compensate U.S. employees and their families who are victims of terrorism.

This bill says that we will not allow terrorists to hold our diplomats and citizens hostage. It shows that we are serious about fighting the very real threat that terrorism poses to the lives and safety of Americans abroad. While Congress alone cannot stop international terrorism, this legislation will certainly make American facilities and American workers overseas more secure.

H.R. 4151 is a bill we can all be proud of; it deserves our unanimous support.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, it had been my understanding that rollcall votes are not held on days that there are State primaries. Had I not been in my district for the Illinois primaries, I would have voted "aye" on the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act, H.R. 4151.

The various programs supported by this act serve many of international objectives in opposing terrorism. This act merely authorizes the program. It will be up to the Appropriations Committee to integrate this program into our budget to comply with the deficit reduction targets that we must meet under Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the basic principles of freedom, justice, and concern for human life on which our Nation was founded have survived major threats during the course of America's history. Today, we face a unique and pervasive challenge to these ideals in the form of terrorism, an increasingly serious threat to the United States and its friends and allies around the world. Colleagues, it is my firm belief that H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorist Act, which provides for the security of U.S. diplomatic personnel, facilities, and operations, will enable the United States to combat terrorists and eventually win the war against international terrorism.

Seeking to impose one's political will over others through the threat or use of violence is as old as history. Over the last few centuries, however, the civilized world was thought to have made progress in establishing nonviolent rules of political conduct. International rules of war, human rights resolutions, and, indeed, the fundamental premises underlying the establishment of the United Nations are all based on the assumption that political violence and political freedom do not and cannot mix. Political intimidation, the object of the use of terrorism, is antithetical to freedom of political expression, the cornerstone of democratic society.

Sadly, there has been a growing trend in the past two decades by individuals, groups, and, in some instances, by governments, to resort to terrorism on an international scale in the pursuit of their political aims. In age of high technology and mass communications such tactics are relatively cheap, effective, and produce a maximum of media exposure. They also cynically sacrifice the lives and well-being of innocent people and eliminate peaceful options of compromise and diplomacy. Left unchanged, the rise of terrorism will undermine the system of political, economic, and military relationships which the United States and its allies have come to rely upon to preserve, protect, and promote their national and mutual interests in an orderly and peaceful fashion. During the years ahead, we must be prepared for continued serious threats from international terrorism in Western Europe, in the Middle East, and in Latin America, much of it supported or encouraged by a handful of ruthless governments. The challenge is clearly before us.

It is my firm belief that H.R. 4151 will provide the United States with the capability to win some of the battles, but in order to win the war against international terrorism, we need an international effort. No matter what our commitment and capability may be, we cannot succeed alone when the threat originates abroad and strikes abroad where other governments necessarily have the major responsibility. But unless and until other governments are willing and able to make the same commitment, the unfavorable trend experienced last year cannot be reversed. Without this international cooperative effort, the terrorists and those behind them will continue to be successful, which will encourage others to utilize terrorism to achieve their political and ideological goals.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the Task Force on International Terrorism and the Foreign Affairs Committee for putting this essential piece of legislation on the fast track, and I would urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4151.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, and my colleagues, I rise today to address an oversight in H.R. 4151. Section 503 of the bill is designed to enhance the ability of the State Department to offer rewards for information concerning the perpetrators of terrorist acts. We are all aware that the best policy improvement that we could make in America's counterterrorism policy would be the enhancement of our intelligence capabilities so as to do whatever possible to either prevent or deter the increasingly ugly specter of terrorism.

Unfortunately, section 503 also creates what amounts to new authority for the State Department to engage in a program of limited rewards for information concerning acts of narcoterrorism. Such rewards would be limited to $500,000 in any individual case and $5 million has been earmarked for this program in fiscal 1987.

It might be overly generous to suggest that the creation of this new authority within the State Department is a flight of bureaucratic fancy. It leaves both the Drug Enforcement Administration and the State Department with separate narcotics trafficking information rewards systems. One might be tempted to conclude that there will be a healthy competition between the two agencies. I am seriously concerned that the creation of separate programs will encourage informants to play agents of these two Federal programs against each other in an attempt to jack up the price of information. Moreover, in these times of budget constraint, I find it troublesome to create a potentially duplicative program in a multibillion-dollar bill whose purposes fall within the most legitimate concerns of the Federal Government.

It is not as if the State Department and the Foreign Affairs Committee had not taken the time to consider the relationship between these two agencies. The Committee report states that it was the intention of the Foreign Affairs Committee to "* * * restrict the use of such rewards to information on individuals considered by the Drug Enforcement Administration to be major narcotics traffickers (class I violators)." Certainly it can be said that if the State Department has to depend on DEA intelligence to identify eligible informants, then they ought to assume that the DEA would be the proper agency to manage the rewards program.

I understand that there was a dispute in the Rules Committee about allowing an amendment to correct this discrepancy. For reasons that are not all that clear to me, the rule that was adopted was structured so as to preclude this needed change. I do not believe that the bill should be defeated because of this flaw but I sincerely hope that the defect could be corrected in the Senate. At the very least, I think we owe it to our constituents to clarify the potentially overlapping responsibilities of the two agencies involved so as to achieve the legitimate purposes of this needed effort in the most efficient manner possible.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act (H.R. 4151). It includes necessary measures that will help to guarantee the safety of diplomatic personnel and other Americans abroad. In recognizing the importance of the legislation we must also realize that budget constraints require us to find savings in other parts of the budget to pay for these measures. I have included my thoughts about how to respond to these budget pressures in a letter to the chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee and to the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. I am including the text of that letter in the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 18, 1986.

Hon. DAVID R. OBEY,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, Washington, DC.

DEAR DAVE: I am writing to you concerning a bill we are voting on today, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act (H.R. 4151). Events over the last several years have demonstrated the need for this kind of legislation. I believe that most members of Congress will agree on the importance of a counter-terrorism program and protection for U.S. government representatives and other Americans abroad.

At a time of budgetary restraint, I am concerned that an authorization of over $4 billion over the next five years will crowd out spending for other programs in the international affairs budget function. It is proper for increased spending in such a high priority item to be balanced by reduced spending in lower priority areas. In setting priorities within this budget function, I hope you will consider balancing the increased spending for anti-terrorism and diplomatic security with reductions in foreign military assistance.

Our development and humanitarian assistance programs are important means of preserving life and economic vitality in Third World nations. In contrast, military assistance programs have a less productive impact on recipient societies and contribute to a world-wide military escalation. Yet spending for these military programs has doubled since 1980 and is now twice the level of spending for development and humanitarian assistance.

As you set priorities and establish spending levels for programs included in the international affairs budget function, I urge you to seriously consider reductions in military assistance to balance the necessary added expenditure for combatting terrorism, protecting U.S. personnel, and providing development and humanitarian assistance.

Sincerely,

GERRY SIKORSKI,
TIMOTHY J. PENNY,
BYRON DORGAN,
Members of Congress.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act, and commend the gentlemen from Florida, Messrs. FASCELL and MICA for their skillful and expeditious handling of this sweeping antiterrorism initiative. At a time when international terrorism has been growing at an alarming rate, we must more effectively protect U.S. personnel and facilities abroad, and provide the executive branch with the authority necessary to combat this rise in terrorist activities directed against American citizens.

While supporting the need to address the serious problem of international terrorism, I must, however, express my reservations about authorizing $4.4 billion in new money to implement this security and antiterrorism program. Although this measure is an authorization bill, and therefore not subject to the spending limitations in the Budget Act, I think that it is somewhat contradictory for us to authorize large sums of new money at the same time that Gramm-Rudman is slashing current expenditures. Many of us did not support the Gramm-Rudman approach to deficit reduction, but the fact remains that Congress is obligated to abide by the limitations on Federal spending as spelled out under Gramm-Rudman. However noble and worthy the cause—which I believe terrorism and security to be—we are authorizing expenditures which are not offset by reductions in other accounts.

In addition to other provisions contained in this bill to upgrade physical security at U.S. embassies abroad and expand the President's ability to deal with international terrorism, I would like to point out a new provision which is designed to further enhance the executive branch's ability to respond to terrorist nations. Section 509 amends the Export Administration Act of 1979, as amended, to broaden the definition of a country supporting terrorism, to ban arms sales and to control more tightly exports of dual-use goods to such countries. The amendment, which was based on legislation introduced by my colleague from California, Mr. BERMAN, statutorily requires a validated export license for any exports of goods or technology which the Secretary of State determines would make a significant contribution to the military potential or would enhance the ability of a terrorist country to support international terrorism. In addition, Congress must be notified 30 days in advance of the issuance of any such license.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act reaffirms and strengthens Congress' deep commitment to combating international terrorism. I urge support of my colleagues for passage of this legislation.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be a cosponsor, coauthor, and strong supporter of this important legislation. I would like to highlight, in particular the section on nuclear terrorism.

I am very pleased that the committee adopted, under a separate title, provisions that I and Representative WOLPE authored on ways in which we can address the threat of international nuclear terrorism.

I cannot stress enought how critical it is that we address this potential threat both at home and in the international community.

For years I have worked diligently to help stop the spread of nuclear weapons, to make certain that nuclear technology and nuclear bomb materials—like plutonium and highly enriched uranium—do not fall into the wrong hands.

The United States has to face up to the increasing traffic in the world of plutonium which is not under U.S. control.

We must recognize that as time goes on there will be more and more of this bomb material moving around the world.

We must also face the possibility that if a terrorist explodes a nuclear device our national security is directly threatened and we must respond to it.

Now is our chance to guard against the day when our diligent efforts for genuine nuclear arms control are thwarted by a few dangerous, irrational people with destructive intentions.

The decision to launch nuclear war must be kept out of the hands of terrorists.

One day we may be held hostage by a terrorist threatening to explode a nuclear bomb, or subjected to the terrorist seizure of nuclear bomb material being transported over land, air, or the high seas. Then, as elected officials, we will be asked, What did you do to prevent this from happening?

What will we say? What will we be able to do?

I ask you, who, then, will finally have control over the nuclear button?

This is why the bill's nuclear terrorism provisions are so important. They are modest and minimal steps that we should take today if we want to be responsible about this future threat.

International cooperation is key to our efforts.

We need universal adherence and enforcement of minimal standards for protection of nuclear shipments.

We must formulate an effective international strategy to deter nations or subnational groups from engaging in acts of nuclear terrorism, and we need to develop a coordinated response plan in the event of a nuclear terrorist attack or seizure of weapons-grade material.

We need to be sure that when bomb materials are transported, that the most stringent physical security standards are applied.

In addition, each of our domestic agencies that use, handle, store, and transport nuclear bomb material—plutonium and highly-enriched uranium—should provide its own perspective and recommendations of how best we can protect ourselves from the terrorist threat, and whether or not our current physical protection standards are adequate to guard against terrorist acts.

This bill includes all these steps.

It also gives the President authority to suspend nuclear cooperation with any nation that has not ratified the International Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material.

In addition, it gives the Department of Defense (DOD) an enhanced role in reviewing the physical security arrangements for nuclear exports and transfers. DOD would provide views on whether the physical protection of the material "during the export or transfer will be adequate to deter theft, subotage, and other acts of international terrorism which would result in a diversion of that material." If it finds that a genuine terrorist threat might exist, then DOD must recommend the steps necessary to upgrade physical protection measures.

All these nuclear terrorism provisions are a good beginning. I hope in the future that we will build on this first step.

For now, this is the very least we should do. Let us not rue the day when terrorists go nuclear. Let us, instead, do something meaningful now, while we still can.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of our time to conclude the debate to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] is recognized for 17 minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for having produced a very constructive and creative piece of legislation.

I would like to add my words to those already spoken in commendation of the splendid spirit of bipartisanship that has prevailed throughout the consideration of this particular piece of legislation. It is a monument to the spirit of bipartisan cooperation. It also stands as a splendid example of interdisciplinary cooperation among the committees of the House.

There is no such thing as partisanship nor committee turf when it comes to the acts of terrorism which more and more have terrorized humanity and the human family. Those who would work their wicked will by sheer, unadulterated terror and threats of terror against innocent and unsuspecting people surely would bring about a reign of international lawlessness of a type that we have not known in recent times.

This is a threat of new and unaccustomed dimension to the United States. We live in this great big, beautiful, open country where we have cherished, and so rightly loved, the right and privilege to move about as we will, to go without restraints, without fear, without concern, to move freely from one part of our land to another without seeking or gaining permission. The world had begun to become a place like that in which people might travel freely back and forth across the artificial boundary that men, through their individual folly, have had to erect.

But now this new threat, in some cases quite obviously the act of governments themselves in which they have sought to make terrorism the sheer, absolute lawlessness of a world community that breeds fear and frustration, a policy of their governments, and so we respond, I think in an effective way. It is a mark of our time that it is a more dangerous occupation to be a diplomat than it is to be a person of the military uniformed armed services.

I was talking last year along with some of our colleagues with Ambassador Rabb in Italy, and he tells us that he knows of seven plots upon his own life, and is not aware of others that may indeed have occurred. Were it not for a splendid degree of international cooperation that is increasingly apparent among the developed and democratic nations of the world, those who are increasingly the victims of terrorism, our Ambassadors and our Embassy in Rome, most surely would have been victimized by an attack that might have been a successful attack from the standpoint of those who would have perpetrated it.

In November of 1984, a guard dog in the Zurich Airport, sniffing among equipment and luggage for explosives, sniffed out one international passenger, and notes on that passenger's possession led the agents to an apartment in Rome in the vicinity of our Embassy. There they discovered a large cache of very dangerous weapons, and some very elaborate drawings by which those would-be terrorists had planned an assault upon our Embassy. Among other things, there was a very elaborate, careful drawing of the room, the office in which our Ambassador does his work, and a window through which they would have stuck a bazooka with the intent of killing him.

This is the kind of thing that we must not just sit back and tolerate happening without our protecting those brave people who represent the United States in our ambassadorial and other diplomatic services. So it is altogether proper, it seems to me, that what the committee has done here has been to propose a systemic plan of strengthening the defense capabilities and security of our sensitive Embassies throughout the world and other sensitive buildings which house U.S. personnel.

Yet with all of that, I think it would be a grave danger if we were to fall into the trap of developing a bunker mentality in which we huddled together and refused and refrained from circulating among the people.

Why were we unaware until too late of the dimensions of the problem that was arising in Iran? I think quite possibly the answer may be because we had no capabilities among our Embassy people to talk Farsi, the language of the streets. We were not out there in the coffee shops and in the streets picking up the kinds of intelligence that might otherwise have alerted us to the danger that was brewing, and finally engulfed us in such a way that it brought shame, and suffering, and real terror to us as a nation.

So, intelligently, this committee, it seems to me, has encouraged people with skills and knowledge, and developed the Fascell fellowships to train other people, and to create an intelligent interflow of information through which our friendly countries might help one another to track the movements of known and suspected terrorists, and also has provided rewards for information leading to the arrest, apprehension, and conviction of those people who have committed acts of terrorism, or who would commit acts of terrorism.

So in all of this, it seems to me that the committee has done an outstanding job. I should like simply, as majority leader, to express my personal thanks, and in behalf of the whole House and all of those on our side of the House to the leaders of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the committee, and the chairman of the subcommittees involved and the ranking minority members on the committees which drafted and brought this legislation to the floor. I should like to express the hope that it will pass by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman for not only his remarks, but for his kind words with regard to the work of the committee. But let me say here, right now, that Speaker O'NEILL and the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], and the leadership on the Republican side, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] deserve a great deal of credit for making it possible to put this interdisciplinary package together, for expediting its consideration, and also for their work with the administration in getting the administration's program incorporated and enacted. So this was truly, as the gentleman from Texas has said, a very enthusiastic and a fine day for the legislature.

Mr. WRIGHT. I surely thank the distinguished gentleman from Florida, [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the committee, and I express the hope that maybe this can be a harbinger of things to come.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 402, the text of H.R. 4418 is considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule in lieu of the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now printed in the bill, and said substitute is considered as having been read.

No amendments to the bill or to said substitute are in order except the following amendments printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 17 by, and if offered by, the member designated, which shall not be subject to amendment except pro forma amendments for the purpose of debate:

First, amendments by Representative MCCAIN; and

"(4) to purchase equipment for use by the Coast Guard, except that not more than 20 percent of any amounts appropriated to carry out this section may be used for purposes of this paragraph; and

"(5) to develop plans and procedures to respond to acts of terrorism against such vessels and facilities.

"(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $125,000,000, to be available until expended, to carry out this section and to conduct the assessments required by sections 905 and 907 of the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986.".

(c) NOTIFICATION TO CONGRESS.—The Congress shall be notified if any travel advisory imposed pursuant to this section is lifted.

SEC. 909. SUSPENSION OF PASSENGER SERVICES.

(a) PRESIDENT'S DETERMINATION.—Whenever the President determines that a foreign nation permits the use of territory under its jurisdiction as a base of operations or training for, or as a sanctuary for, or in any way arms, aids, or abets, any terrorist organization which knowingly uses the illegal seizure of passenger vessels or the threat thereof as an instrument of policy, the President may, without notice or hearing and for as long as the President determines necessary to assure the security of passenger vessels against unlawful seizure, suspend the right of any passenger vessel common carrier to operate to and from, and the right of any passenger vessel of the United States to utilize, any port in that foreign nation for passenger service.

The Congress finds that—

(1) there is evidence that terrorists consider bases and installations of United States Armed Forces outside the United States to be targets for attack;

It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the Secretary of Defense should review the security of each base and installation of the Department of Defense outside the United States, including the family housing and support activities of each such base or installation, and take the steps the Secretary considers necessary to improve the security of such bases and installations; and

SEC. 1103. REPORT TO THE CONGRESS.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MC CAIN

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCCAIN: In section 5569(d)(2) of title 5 of the United States Code (as proposed to be enacted by section 802(a) of the amendment)—

(1) strike out "captive—" and all that follows through "(B) shall" and insert in lieu thereof "captive shall";

(2) strike out "(i)" and "(ii)" and insert in lieu thereof "(A)" and "(B)", respectively; and

(3) reset the margins of subparagraphs (A) and (B), as so redesignated, on a 2-em indention.

Mr. McCAIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is quite simple. I have discussed it with the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], and I hope that we can dispense with it very rapidly.

As you know, the legislation before us provides a number of benefits to former captives, hostages and POW's. Amongst these is a cash payment on top of salary, medical expenses and educational benefits.

My amendment strikes the lines which follow Presidential discretion in making this payment for "taking into account the treatment received by such individuals while in captivity and any other factor which the President considers appropriate."

I would like to quote, Mr. Chairman, from the Legislative History of Public Law 91-289, War Claims—Vietnam Conflict—Prisoners. This is the Senate report of May 20, 1970.

I quote:

The committee recognizes that the amounts provided by the bill for members of the Armed Forces and for civilian American citizens held captive are inadequate compensation for the hardships they have suffered; however, since in general no monetary payment can actually be adequate compensation, the committee feels that the payments provided in the bill serve as a symbolic gesture on the part of the United States expressing recognition of the hardships suffered by the beneficiaries in keeping with the procedure established under the World War II and Korean conflict claims program.

I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, to remember that this payment is purely symbolic. The Federal Government has already taken care of any or all medical, psychological expenses related to a person's captivity.

In September 1981, the President's Commission on Hostage Compensation issued their final report on the Iranian hostage crisis. Mr. James S. Dwight, Jr., served as chairman of this body. Other members included Patricia Roberts Harris, Cyrus Vance, former Senator Henry Bellmon, our former colleague Robert Giaimo and others.

I would like to quote from their report:

The Commission considered the possibility of attempting to adjust benefits to reflect the relative degree of trauma and suffering endured by the various hostages but was unable to find a reliable formula for measuring what was a subjective experience for each one. Furthermore, the Commission noted the request of the hostages themselves, as expressed by the Family Liaison Action Group [FLAG], that all of the hostages be treated alike. The Commission concluded that the most acceptable methods, and one which had previously been used in the War Claims Act, would be to recommend a retention benefit for each hostage based on the number of days spent in captivity or hiding to avoid capture.

It is not possible for anyone in Washington, I believe, Mr. Chairman, to fairly judge the harshness of treatment a captive receives at the hands of a captor. Equally rough physical treatment might be easily accepted by a 19-year-old marine, yet be a terrible burden to a 55-year-old CIA operative. On the other hand, the CIA agent might have an easier time accepting psychological abuse.

I believe this language is based on unreliable, subjective judgment and has no place in this bill, and should therefore be deleted, and I urge adoption of my amendment.

Mr. MICA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MICA. I would say that on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, we understand the gentleman's sincere concern, and that we have no objection to this language.

Ms. SNOWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. SNOWE. I just want to thank the gentleman for raising what is a very important and valid issue. His amendment is a constructive one, and I, too, would urge its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. McCAIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MC CAIN

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCAIN: In section 5569(d) of title 5 of the United States Code (as proposed to be enacted by section 802(a) of the amendment), strike out paragraph (2) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(2)(A) A payment under this subsection shall be in the amount of $20 (as adjusted under subparagraph (B)) for each day for which such individual was held as a captive.

"(B) The amount referred to in subparagraph (A) shall be adjusted by the President as of January 1, 1987, and at intervals of one year thereafter to reflect changes in the consumer price index (prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor) for the period beginning on the date of the enactment of this section and ending on the day before the date of the adjustment.

Mr. McCAIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid this amendment will not be quite as easy as the last.

My second amendment sets a new base rate of cash compensation for former captives. Let me briefly review for the committee what this title of the bill already does:

It establishes an interest-bearing savings fund to benefit individuals held captive;

It provides health benefits to captives and family members for all medical care that is related to the captivity and is not covered by an existing health policy;

It permits courts to defer any legal actions against captives during their period of captivity, if their enforced absence would be prejudicial to their case;

It provides educational benefits to the spouse and children of captives;

It authorizes the United States to pay compensation for the death or disability of employees and family members;

It authorizes up to 1 year leave with pay for foreign service nationals, which is now available to FSOs, for recuperation from injuries resulting from terrorist acts; and

In addition, it requires the President to make the forementioned cash payment to former captives based on the worldwide average per diem rate during their captivity.

Compensation for POWs and internees were first set up by the War Claims Act of 1948, found in sections 2004 and 2005 of title 50 of the United States Code. World War II internees, Mr. Chairman, were compensated at a rate of $60 a month; $2 a day. POWs received $1 a day for inadequate food; "for each day he was held POW on which the enemy government or its agents failed to provide him such quantity or quality of food" as defined by the Geneva Convention, and $1.50 a day for confinement.

Korean internees and POW's were compensated at an identical rate. Personnel assigned to the Pueblo were compensated at the same rate; $1.50 for confinement and $1 for food each day. Those held as POW's in Vietnam were compensated $2 a day for food and $3 a day for confinement. Internees got $150 a month; the same amount as POW's.

Therefore, it is beyond me to understand the reasoning behind a per diem payment to hostages or captives. The Federal Government currently reimburses Federal employees on a per diem basis to cover costs while traveling abroad. That is the purpose of per diem; to cover costs while traveling abroad.

These public servants use this payment to cover living expenses such as hotel rooms and meals. I fail to see the connection to a hostage or a captive situation between per diem payments. The per diem payment, to a large degree, is revised on a periodic basis which has a great deal to do with the strength of the dollar. So we are now, tying payments for people being held captive or hostage to the strength of the dollar.

The per diem concept is not based on past compensation rates, nor does it take into consideration the recommendations of the President's Commission on Hostage Compensation. I want to point out here, Mr. Chairman, that in 1980, after the return of the Iranian hostages, a commission was appointed of some of the brightest minds in this country, and some of the most experienced ones.

Among them are Cyrus Vance, former Secretary of State, Patricia Roberts Harris, Senator Henry Bellmon, former Senator from Oklahoma and our own former colleague, Robert Giaimo. Their conclusions were far different from that arrived at in this legislation.

In fact, I would say dramatically so. I quote:

The Commission felt it proper to recommend that the President suggest to the Congress a further upward adjustment in this figure to $12.50 per day to take into account the impact of inflation since 1970.

My amendment sets this figure at $20 a day, which I believe is more than generous and exceeds that of the inflation rate since 1980 when the hostages were returned.

We are not discussing here salary or wages. Government employees and military will continue to receive their full pay and benefits during captivity. We are not discussing reimbursement for medical expenses; past, present, or future. This is taken care of elsewhere in the title. We are not discussing high costs of college, that is covered, too. We are talking about a cash payment on top of all the others that I mentioned earlier.

Let me again quote from the Commission's report:

(By unanimous consent, Mr. McCAIN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

The Commission regards this suggested detention benefit as a recognition of the hardships suffered by the hostages in the service of their country. It does not represent a finding as to the extent of their sufferings and it is not intended to compensate the hostages for their injuries. As was the case with prisoners of war and internees, any cause of action would lie against the persons or nations which perpetrated the injury and the United States is not, by making an award, purporting to act for or stand as a surrogate for the persons whose tortuous actions injured the hostages.

Finally, I would like to read from a letter I received last fall from a foreign service officer who was detained during the Vietnam war by the North Vietnamese, and I quote:

This man says: "Yet it is being suggested in some circles that the average world-wide per diem * * * be paid to former Iran hostages. If such an amount is actually approved, it would make a joke of the awards we received after undergoing far greater trauma and damage to careers." He goes on to say "It would be monstrous to make beneficiaries of those who were in difficult straits for 400-odd days, yet continue to deny special benefits to those incarcerated five times as long in heart-of-darkness settings."

If we do approve this fiscally irresponsible per diem formula will we make it retroactive to cover those incarcerated during past conflicts? Would it be fair if we did not?

My amendment is based on historical and legal precedents, based on the conclusions arrived at by a Presidentially appointed commission of some of the best talent in this country.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. McCAIN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. McCAIN. I would like to point out something I think has been lost in this debate. I think it is important, and I have not heard it raised yet.

Why do young men and women join the service of our country, whether they happen to be in the military or the foreign service? They join because of patriotism and dedication. They do not join for monetary compensation.

I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, for us to reward those who underwent hardship.

□ 1805

But I do not believe that monetary compensation to this degree is in any way the kind of compensation that they would expect nor do I believe that this kind of compensation is suitable and fitting and in keeping with past precedent of those men and women who have served with honor and sacrifice in previous wars.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

I think there are several different things we need to point out here. First of all this has been a very difficult subject and it has been going on, the debate, for 6 years as to what to do about this. But my subcommittee received hours and hours and hours of testimony on this issue. I think what we are missing is there are all sorts of ancillary expenses that are not covered. What this really goes to is the victims, the other victims, and that is the family, or to many of the inconveniences that transpired and so forth. There is absolutely no question that it does not come anywhere near close to compensating the person who is being held. I mean this is not like a windfall. I cannot think of anybody in the world who would like to be a hostage for $66 a day because of the money they were going to make on this. They just would not.

What we are trying to say is we had testimony that the families had tremendous number of phone calls, the phone bills went clear off the wall; children being very distressed, lots of extra trips that they took to see grandparents, or finding a root or finding anything that could stabilize; things that are really difficult to put in there.

Now we also had one of the first hostages who was ever taken by terrorists testify and he was very interesting. He was with the State Department. He had a diplomatic passport and he was on one of the first planes that got hijacked. So he went over and when they were hijacked he pulled out his diplomatic passport and he said, "I'm a United States diplomat and I must negotiate for all these people and you cannot talk to any of them unless I am there, if they are from the United States."

I am not sure that anybody would volunteer to do that today because we have learned a little more. Even he said in retrospect it was incredible that he was not shot. But he pointed out how many days after all of this that he was held. He was singled out and held for a very long time because they found him to be a real pain in that he was protecting so many of the hostages, many of whom were Americans of the Jewish faith and this was one of those areas where it was a very sensitive affair and he did an excellent job in protecting them. Nobody questioned that.

But he was very angry because when it was all over he had just submitted—he could not figure out what to do because he had lots of expenses, could not figure out what he could do so he said he would just submit a per diem bill thinking that was fair. At least that was close to what anybody else would be paying. Of course it got turned down. Now I understand and it is very painful because in the past we have not paid prisoners of war very much money and in here in the bill if the military opts to continue on with POW benefits being something else they certainly can pass it and we yield to them by the language in this bill.

But I am not too sure we should not really stop and think about this. When you look at the private sector they do not treat it as something that you do not pay for. They treat it as something where they are putting the people that serve them on the line, they are putting them out there, they understand that they are targets and they understand that you keep the morale high if you show the respect and say, "We are going to at least try and cover out-of-pocket."

We do not know what everybody's out-of-pocket is going to be, they are all going to be different. We had all sorts of debates in our committee as to what was appropriate. One was about twice what we are talking about here; other people offered amendments with more. We went round and round and round and round. But we finally came back and decided that the per diem made an incredible amount of sense because the Federal Government pays everybody per diem when they are representing the Government somewhere. They pay them that whether they stay with their uncle, I suppose, or whether they stay in a $10-a-night hotel or whether they stay at a $200-a-night hotel, that is kind of their option, the per diem is there. So if you were there and representing your Government and you were not allowed to ever come home again, does that not make sense to make that that is one thing that you could at least lock in as being fair? I think you could make a good argument that that is not fair, that they should be given much more. But we are not trying to do that. We are not trying to do the pain and suffering or the negligence or any of the other things that you get into in liability. We are just trying to cover it.

Every single family of every single hostage that we talked to ran other costs that were different. So I do not know how you would ever quantify them. Plus, as I say, it is also a time when they probably needed much more in the line of entertainment expenses and lots of other things because of the stress they were under.

So we decided this was fair. We decided this was the way to go and the military can get out if they want to. I certainly hope people turn down this amendment.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am opposed to this amendment, although reluctantly, because I have high regard and respect for the gentleman from Arizona. Yet I am pleased that he has raised this issue today because it is a legitimate issue that needs to be discussed and should be decided based on the collective wisdom and judgment of the House of Representatives.

The provisions in the legislation provide for retroactive compensation to the Iranian hostages, who have yet to be compensated. The question is what compensation do we provide to former hostages and potential hostages? Deciding that level of compensation was the most difficult issue the committee had to address in developing the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act.

Frankly, any amount of compensation or appropriate standard for determining such compensation is at best an arbitrary judgment.

We all recognize that no amount of money can adequately compensate for such an ordeal. But we, as a country, have an obligation to pay some form of restitution to reflect in some small way the hardships that they endured. So I believe that this is a question that needs to be addressed by the House here today. It is a judgment that has to be made by each and every Member.

Do we provide a higher amount or a lesser amount? To make that decision I think it is essential to provide some additional background on how we arrived at the figure incorporated in this legislation.

Back in 1981 the Presidential Commission on Hostage Compensation recommended $12.50 per day. That was based on taking the $7 provided to the POW's in Vietnam, adjusting it for inflation. Then the Post Office and Civil Service Committee recommended a figure that was higher. They recommended a higher level because of frustration over the long delays in providing compensation to the Iranian hostages. They recommended a lump-sum compensation of $50,000 that would translate into $115 per day. So the Subcommittee on International Operations decided that, instead, we would take the average worldwide per diem which would today yield $66 per day. The gentleman from Arizona is now recommending the Presidential Commission's recommendations of $12.50, adjusting it for inflation, and that would provide $20 per day for the Iranian hostages. I would remind the members of the committee that it has been 5 long years since that crisis ended and this compensation is long overdue.

I personally advocate a higher amount. If we were to maintain the subcommittee's recommendation of a lump-sum compensation of $29,000 or $66 a day I believe that it represents a fair compensation under the circumstances. So I would ask the members of the committee to think about the issues and the alternatives before this body. It is a personal judgment. It is a decision that has to be made by each and every Member. We made our decision as a committee. Now it is up to the House to decide whether or not we want the higher amount proposed by the committee or the lesser amount recommended by the gentleman from Arizona.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I would be glad to yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

I think she has done an excellent job of explaining this. I think one more thing that I forgot to mention is we have to point out that under the Algiers agreement these people cannot sue, whether they are paid or not paid. I think that is a very important thing that we need to underline, put some exclamation points around it and everything, that people who work for the Government cannot sue because of their being held hostage after the Algiers agreement, and I think that puts us at a higher level of responsibility.

Ms. SNOWE. The gentlewoman from Colorado raises an excellent point in that respect, and something that we have failed to recognize.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

In the context of the previous point raised I point out that no one who was held POW at any time can sue for anything, either. So I am not sure. That not only does not separate them, it puts them in the same group as the entire people who have suffered the same amount or, bases it on a more fair basis. I do not think the fact that they cannot sue anybody has anything to do which would differentiate them from any other POW or hostage.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill.

I do so however, with one reservation. Members should not, having approved this bill, conclude that the challenge of responding to international terrorism has been met. The brick and mortar approach to combating terrorism—which is essentially the approach taken by this bill— is justified; it is needed; but it is not all that we have to do.

Fighting terrorism is not simply a matter of constructing walls between our diplomats and the people of foreign lands. The greater portion of our energies must be directed, instead, toward breaking down the walls of misunderstanding and fear that exist between ourselves and those whose religion, culture, and lifestyle differ dramatically from our own.

We must remember that terrorism is nourished by hate; and hate by ignorance. Those who encourage terrorism are strengthened when—out of complacency, self-satisfaction, or simple laziness—we ignore the needs or fail to acknowledge the legitimate rights of those in other lands.

We ought never for an instant to forget that we live in a world that remains, on the whole, desperately poor. To the majority, the American lifestyle is alien, and American ideals difficult to comprehend; ignorance, in this sense, is a two way street. But because of our wealth, our power, and our pretentions to world leadership, we have a special responsibility to break down the walls that separate the peoples of the world; it is our job to take the initiative in this effort, and it is in our interests, because terrorism will not prosper where hatred and misunderstanding have ceased.

I make this argument in the context of this debate, because I believe we need a reminder from time to time of what our real goals in foreign policy should be. It may be that in recent years we have devoted too much time to the application of ideological litmus tests to foreign groups and leaders; we may have placed too much emphasis on military as opposed to humanitarian and economic aid; we may be trying too hard to remake the world in the image of ourselves; and we may have begun to fear others once again solely because they view the world differently, not because they threaten our interests or our lives.

Our response to terrorism, then, must go beyond the construction of secure embassies, or the convening of international conferences, or the denunciation of violence directed against ourselves or our allies and friends. The legislation we are considering today can supplement, but it cannot render unnecessary, other efforts required to respond both to the symptoms and the causes of international terrorism.

With this reservation in mind, I want to express my admiration for the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. FASCELL, for his work in developing this legislation. I would note that title 9 of the bill, dealing with maritime security, was developed with the close cooperation of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. That title contains and important provision, section 906, that I offered during committee consideration of the bill.

This section authorized the Secretary of Transportation to take certain actions to improve port security and safety in the United States. A total of $125 million would be authorized, without fiscal year limitation, primarily for activities to be carried out by the U.S. Coast Guard.

I call special attention to this section because it is one of the provisions that makes a concrete commitment on the part of our country to do something other than simply talk about doing something to defend against terrorist attacks. Too often, the tendency in Washington is to conclude that because we have said something, we have therefore done something. The fact is that if we take the threat of maritime terrorism seriously, we need to do at home what we will be asking others to do overseas; and we have got to come up with the resources needed to get that job done.

And we are not getting that job done today.

The Coast Guard, primarily as a result of Gramm-Rudman, has an operating budget that is $97 million below the amount originally requested for this year by President Reagan. When added to reductions made in earlier years, the Coast Guard is now operating with 2,000 fewer military and civilian personnel than it had in 1981.

Because of the high priority attached by Congress and the administration to drug law enforcement, a substantial portion of the Coast Guard's remaining resources have been dedicated to that mission. As a result, the Coast Guard's ability to accomplish its other missions—including port security—has been compromised.

I think it is revealing that since 1980, during 5 years in which we have supposedly been building up our defense capabilities, the number of Coast Guard personnel devoted to port safety has declined by 20 percent; the number of routine harbor patrols conducted by the Coast Guard has declined from 226,700 annually to 44,000; the number of waterfront inspections has declined by 50 percent; and the Coast Guard has been unable to meet even a reduced National Security Council standard for boarding vessels from Communist bloc countries entering the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. STUDDS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. STUDDS. In response to the hijacking of the Achille Lauro last year, the United States appealed to the international community to pay greater attention to port security; but our case is weak. The fact is that when it comes to security, American harbors are the functional equivalent of the Athens airport or the streets of Beirut.

I could describe the rationale for this section of the bill at enormous length, but I suspect Members get the point. Protection against terrorism begins at home; and with respect to coastal matters, the Coast Guard is the first line of defense. I appreciate the support of Members on both sides for this provision of the bill, and I hope—and trust—that this support will carry over into the appropriations process in the months ahead.

Finally, I also want to mention the inclusion of section 508 of the bill. This section reflects an effort on my part to narrow a proposal that was put forward by the administration about a year and a half ago. That proposal was prompted by the so-called Wilson-Terpil case, which caused the Justice Department to conclude that Americans could lawfully provide services of great value to countries seeking people and skills useful in the execution of terrorist acts. The administration's proposal was drafted in an extremely broad fashion, raising a host of questions about who it would affect and how it would be implemented.

The language in H.R. 4151 differs from the administration proposal in that it only applies to services having a direct military, law enforcement, or intelligence application that are provided to governments that have been placed by the Secretary of State on the list of those actively supporting international terrorism. The Secretary is authorized to impose controls on this narrow category of services if he determines that this will reduce the likelihood that acts of terrorism will be carried out.

I think it is vital that the record of this debate indicate that the language in H.R. 4151 is the broadest that the House of Representatives can support. We will resist any effort in negotiations with the Senate, or in subsequent legislation, to expand the applicability of this language.

Under this section, the Secretary of State is authorized to impose controls on services only if he determines that, in so doing, we will discourage support for international terrorism; our goal is to stop the provision of services that will lead directly to an improved capability on the part of a hostile foreign power to carry out, or to support, acts of terrorism, and not to restrict in any other way the right of American citizens to go about their business as they please.

This language has the merit of speaking to the problem that prompted it—the Wilson-Terpil case—without going beyond it to try to solve problems that have not been demonstrated to exist. I think it is consistent with other actions Congress has taken to limit the export of—weapons and so-called dual use items—to countries that are on the terrorist list. We have to recognize, it seems to me, that under some circumstances the provision of services can be at least as damaging as the sale of a truck or a rifle.

In summary, this is an excellent piece of legislation; it is a useful component of what I hope will become a far more comprehensive and balanced response to international terrorism than we have developed so far; it includes a provision of great importance to the domestic security of the United States; and I hope that it will receive favorable action here today and in the other body in the near future.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, first I must say that as a member of my subcommittee, I have the greatest respect for the gentleman who has offered the amendment [Mr. MCCAIN]. We have had numerous discussions on this particular amendment. It is for this reason I think Members should listen up, particularly if they are listening back in their offices. There will be a vote on this amendment. We decided to bring this to the floor to make it a judgment of the entire House, because this is a judgment issue.

Simply stated, what we are debating is the amount of money the Iranian hostages or any hostages should get as some types of compensation for each day that they were held. We have had some recommendations from the hostage family group that it be $100 a day. We had a commission say that it should be $12.50 a day. Some have even said less, just a token amount.

The committee recognized very clearly that it is just a matter of discretion. We said, in effect, we will pick the figure that we feel is reasonable, and that is the worldwide per diem rate. In this case, it is $66 a day for each of the Iranian hostages who were held for 444 days.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona would take the $66-a-day figure and reduce it to $20 a day.

There is no easy way to make this judgment. If the gentleman is correct, it is simply and purely a judgment.

We, the committee, virtually unanimously, with one objection, felt that the worldwide per diem figure of $66 a day was fair. It is automatically adjusted. It accounts for inflation. We do not have any problems with that. It is a reasonable figure. We also had a recommendation of $50,000. There was some thought that the President should have some discretion, and the gentleman just received approval from this body that there would be no discretion from the President. I have a letter from the administration indicating that if the President does not have discretion and, rather than the $50,000, the President would support the per diem.

So, simply stated, we are talking about $66 a day or $20 a day, and that is the basic question here.

It is a judgment that the Members have to make. There is no formula, no scientific approach to this question.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to take a couple of minutes to respond to some of the statements that have been made concerning this issue.

First of all, I would like to again express my appreciation to Chairman MICA for his hard work, Ms. SNOWE and Mrs. SCHROEDER for the many hours of effort they have devoted to the entire bill.

As Chairman MICA just pointed out, there is a disagreement on numbers here. I think that it is important to refer to the precedent that has been established since 1948.

The first time that compensation was adjudged for men who were held prisoner was after World War II in 1948, again in 1953, and again in 1970. These were updated after each conflict.

Mr. Chairman, I might add that these amounts of money went from $2 a day or $60 a month for those held in World War II—I repeat, $60 a month—up to $3 a day for the Korean War and $5 a day for those who were held as POW's in Vietnam. So there has been a precedent, and that was fully taken into consideration when the President's commission came up with a figure of $12.50 a day as adequate compensation.

I have raised it to $20 a day in my amendment, which far exceeds the inflation since then, and my amendment is also tied to the CPI.

I also want to raise again that what is in fairness to others who have been held hostage or prisoner in other wars in some instances, a case could be made they were under less pleasant conditions than those who were held hostage in Iran.

I think that we are trying to compensate Americans who underwent an unbelieveable hardship. I believe that they deserve compensation. I hope that the body will consider my amendment as fair compensation for their sacrifices.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. McCAIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCAIN) there were—ayes 5, noes 6.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER:

(1) in the section heading, strike out "EFFECTIVE DATE OF ENTITLEMENTS"and insert in lieu thereof "SPECIAL BUDGET ACT RULES FOR ENTITLEMENTS"; and

(2) strike out the period at the end of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", and shall be effective for any fiscal year only to the extent or in the amounts provided in appropriation Acts.".

In the table of contents in section 2, amend the item relating to section 806 to read as follows:

Sec. 806. Special Budget Act rules for entitlements.

Mr. WALKER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, on this matter, we are not raising any issues with regard to decisions that the committee has made beyond the decision made to make the compensation program an entitlement program.

Let me say from the outset that whatever the rationale that might be used in this particular instance for an entitlement program, what we are doing with making that decision is violating the Budget Act and violating the Gramm-Rudman provision. We have said flatly that we shall not enact new entitlement programs on this floor.

Yet, here we are with a bill that does specifically that.

Whatever the merits of the case—whatever the merits of the case—this is purely and simply an end run around the balanced budget law making in order a balanced budget by 1991.

It seems to me that when you have high budget deficits and you are trying to do something about them, you do not go around creating new entitlement authority. That is what we do here.

□ 1830

What you do is make the money in the bill subject to the regular congressional appropriations process.

All my amendment is, is a vote to keep spending under our control, under congressional control, and not hand it over to an entitlement program.

It just seems to me that if we are going to spend the money, we ought to vote the funds. We have gotten ourselves in a lot of trouble over the years by refusing to understand that basic concept, and that is that if we are going to spend the people's money, we ought to stand up and actually vote the funds.

Many Members of Congress have come to this floor in recent months and they have talked about a pay-as-you-go concept. Well, here it is. Here is the real question: Are we really going to think about things on a pay-as-you-go basis? This amendment of mine is purely and simply a pay-as-you-go amendment. It says that we are going to put in place the authorization program; we are not going to change one word of how the committee has structured that, but we are going to subject any spending to the regular appropriations process.

I think that is reasonable, and I do not see why we cannot at least try it that way for a while.

People have come to this floor today and they have made very valid arguments about the fact that Congress simply has not acted in the past. Yes, that may be true. There was no program authorized in the past that moved us in a particular direction toward helping the hostage victims.

But now we are going to have an authorization program. Why not at least for a little while find out whether or not it would work, using the regular appropriations process? Why, right off the bat, do we have to make it an entitlement? Why, right immediately, do we have to say that we are going to lose control over the spending process ourselves?

It seems to me that the very least we ought to do, given the fact that this particular provision is a violation of the budget bill, given the fact that it violates the Balanced Budget Act, the very least we ought to do out here today is adopt this amendment and try it for a while under the regular appropriations process.

That is what this amendment is all about. It simply says: Do we want a new entitlement program? Or do we want to go through the regular appropriations process?

It seems to me that this is not the time to foist upon the American taxpayer a new entitlement program. It is a time to stick with the regular appropriations process.

I ask for an "aye" vote on the amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think none of us on this House floor want to create new entitlement programs, normally, and especially if we are going to create new entitlement programs for a whole group of class that we can see demographics changing, and all sorts of things.

But I must say, that kind of consistency, if we are going to be so absolutely consistent that we make the mistake of not creating this as an entitlement, I think we should be ashamed, and I mean that, because I think this is a very different kind of situation, when we had hostage after hostage testify that one of the major concerns they had when they were being incarcerated is whether or not their families were being taken care of.

And if we say we are not going to make an entitlement available for that situation because of the Budget Act and because of this and because of that, we are really not treating the people that we are asking to risk their lives and everything else, we are not treating them with any kind of respect, and I think we should hang our heads as public officials.

We know that Americans are real targets, we know that as a superpower it bears all sorts of burdens. We know we send people out there that we cannot reimburse adequately, and we are asking them to run all sorts of risks. And when we hear from the ones who ran the risk and were incarcerated that their No. 1 concern was constantly worrying about their families, I cannot believe that we cannot make this an entitlement. This is not a huge entitlement. We do not know that it will ever cost anything. Let us hope that it will never cost anything. But let us be able, as the U.S. Congress, to say to people working for this Government: If something happens to you, we are going to take care of your family, don't worry, it is an entitlement, you do not have to wait and see if Congress gets to it, you do not have to wait and see if they are out of session that year, you do not have to wait to see if something else happens, we have made it an entitlement. And I think that is absolutely bottom line, because we do not give them much of anything else. We are taking their pensions away or we are cutting their pay or we are freezing their COLA or we are cutting this or we are cutting that, and to put them out there and subject them to the risk that every single one of us knows they are subjected to, and to say to them, "We are going to just let you sit there, and of course you will not get any newspapers once you are incarcerated to know whether we did pass it, and you do not know if we will get around to it," I remind the Members that it has taken 6 years to get this to the floor, since the Iranian hostage situation. To think we would do that I find just shocking.

So certainly I do not want to create any new massive entitlement programs. Let us pray this is an entitlement program that is never used. I do not think any of us ever want this to be used. But, for crying out loud, let us not be so narrow, let us not be so nitpicking, let us not be so really small in our thinking that we say we are going to be pure and we will not create this as an entitlement program, let us realize the tremendous, tremendous confort this would be to Federal employees all over the world, to know that the Federal Government has finally spoken on this, that if anything should happen, which we certainly hope it does not, that they are protected and they do not have to sit around and worry about that. They have got enough to worry about, and I think it is the least we can do. I will be very much ashamed of this House if this amendment is passed.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in strong opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, this amendment guts the whole purpose of this legislation.

What we are talking about are individuals who are taken hostage being able to have some knowledge that their families will be taken care of, and that this will be done automatically. That is the purpose of an entitlement. Can you imagine the situation of an individual, under the terms of this amendment, if it were adopted, saying, "Yes; I have been taken hostage, I am held here in solitary, but under the terms of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if the Congress acts some day, my family might be taken care of."

That is not what we want.

The whole idea here was to give some realistic, reliable assurance to families, to friends, to individuals, that if there were a problem they would not have to wait for a future act of Congress. "Is the Congress in recess? Is the Congress debating the tax bill? Is the Congress doing other things? Is the Congress to busy? Are there going to be points of order?" All of this would stand in the way of quick action on behalf of the hostages and their families.

The gentleman makes a good point that we do need to follow appropriate procedures. The gentleman is known as a watchdog on budget and procedure, and I respect him for that role here in the Congress, but I do not think he realizes that there is no new money in this provision. This money is within the funds already available to the State Department and other agencies. We are dealing with $1.6 million—not $1.6 billion, but $1.6 million—in existing funds already appropriated. $1.6 million in existing funds for the 52 hostages, and I think there were 1 or 2 others that we are dealing with here. So that is not new money, it is not in violation of Gramm-Rudman or the Budget Act at this point.

If there were new hostages, more funds would be required but they would be taken from existing budgets. But the idea was to give some assurance so that the next group would not sit in solitary, would not sit as hostages under most difficult and trying circumstances and say, "Will it be 6 years before the Congress acts, as it was with the Iranian hostage situation?"

So I understand the concern for the budget process. I understand also the gentleman's desire to abide by technicalities. But if we are looking at technicalities, there is no new money in this legislation for this purpose.

I would be happy to yield, for a moment, to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I think the gentleman ought to understand a little bit how the bill came to the floor.

This gentleman allowed the bill to come to the floor by unanimous consent under an assurance that there were no things in it which violated the Gramm-Rudman Balanced Budget Act.

The chairman of the committee, in telling me that—I know he said so in all honesty—I do not think he understood that this did in fact violate Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. MICA. If I may reclaim my time, I think we have a basic disagreement. There is no new money in this provision. And, in fact, under the gentleman's provision, if the gentleman's provision passes, it would authorize, a new appropriation or an increase, if you will.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, that of course is not the issue here. What we are attempting to do——

Mr. MICA. Reclaiming my time, the gentleman just indicated that that was the key issue, that we are violating Gramm-Rudman and the Budget Act, and indeed that is not the case.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman will admit that in bringing the bill to the floor they had to get a waiver of the Budget Act because this provision was in it.

Mr. MICA. The gentleman indicates there was a waiver, but I do not believe it was because there was new money in the bill. This is money that is a part of the appropriation that is already available to the State Department.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, the problem is that you are creating an entitlement program before you have a budget provision, and that is the problem. This gentleman understood that problem. He brought the amendment to the floor in order to try to correct a problem that you have created with your legislation. If the gentleman does not want any corrections, I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MICA was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MICA. I think the technical point that we are debating is the point that we have just raised here, that there is not new money authorized by this title.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I want to just straighten the record out, if I can.

There was no unanimous consent to take this bill to the floor, I will tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania. With respect to the waiver situation at the time I spoke to the gentleman on the floor last week, I was incorrect about the bill at that time; but all of those problems were corrected, I will tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania, at his insistence. The second point is that, with respect to the waiver that brings this bill to the floor, the only reason a waiver is required is because the budget resolution has not yet been adopted and this bill was granted waiver from the Rules Committee with the approval of the Budget Committee.

Now, all I will say is that the gentleman can pursue his technicality as far as he wants to pursue it, but please do not assert that there is a violation of the law. We have complied with the law; and that is the reason we are here under the kind of rule that we were granted.

Now, you can say you do not want an entitlement program. You can say that you would rather have these funds provided in an appropriation. That is your privilege, and that is the reason your amendment is offered, and I hope it does what you think it does, but I believe that does not achieve your purpose. What it will do is this: It will require new money, whereas if you go under the entitlement program it requires the use of existing funds.

I am just saying what it does. You can still go your way if you want to. You have made your point. I do not understand why it would make any difference. Before this bill becomes a law, the technicality you are concerned about will cease to be a problem because in all likelihood, a budget resolution will be in place before this bill completes the legislative process.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has expired.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

We have not only acquired the waiver which the law permits us to get from the Budget Committee, but I dare say it would be cured before it ever becomes the kind of problem the gentleman is talking about.

Now, let me just for 1 second examine the scope of this thing, aside from the fact that we are talking about the lives of people and that two committees have decided that the very best way to handle that is to write it into law so there is no question about whether or not these people will get the compensation that is written into the law, it becomes an entitlement program and it does not require further acts of Congress except for the allocation of the money.

First of all, we are talking right now today about existing payments that would go to known hostages. Am I correct?

Mr. MICA. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FASCELL. And that is $1.6 million; am I correct?

Mr. MICA. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. But let us examine this question of entitlement, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his zeal to protect the law—I am certainly not derogatory about that, I think that is commendable, and he is known all over the country on cable television as the watchdog of the whole program of the Budget Act. But we are following the Budget Act, Mr. Chairman. We are following the Budget Act.

□ 1845

Now, on the scope of this, we are not talking about Medicare or Medicaid or a large program as the chairperson said, from the Post Office and Civil Service Committee. We are talking about a limited number of people here who are known right now and payments to them, whether it is by appropriation or entitlement, would be $1.6 million.

What about the future? What does an entitlement program or an appropriation do in the future? Answer: We do not know. There are no hostages out there yet, and I hope there will not be. So I suppose in a very technical sense the gentleman from Pennsylvania could make a point that he would rather have an appropriation rather than an entitlement because nowadays in the context of the whole process the word "entitlement" has become a buzz word.

Once having made that point, it seems to me, and the fact that we have assured him and the people of this country that we have cured all of the technicalities with this, it seems to me that the better part of wisdom right now would be that he has made his point is to withdraw the amendment.

The money is going to be paid one way or the other. The gentleman is not going to fight the appropriation; I know that. I mean, I know he has got a heart and a soul; I know that. The only thing is, and I am serious about this, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; You have made your point; we have done our best to cure. You want to turn it around legislatively which is your prerogative and that is the reason this amendment is in order.

I really wish the gentleman would not do that.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would just like to say that if this amendment were adopted, it would take an act of Congress to make this entire provision apply to one hostage.

I think that is wrong and I do not think we should put ourselves in that position.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman does raise a serious concern in this period of fiscal realities; a legitimate concern about creating new entitlements, and I always share that concern with the gentleman.

But there are several reasons why the committee chose this funding mechanism. First, I would like to point out this is a very narrow and limited entitlement that was requested by the administration to fill a very specific and unique purpose.

The Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act would provide compensation, as has been mentioned here during the course of this debate, to American hostages and their families. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the cost of this legislation would be $1.6 million for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987, which the appropriation would be provided for by the State Department and would not require an additional appropriation.

I would point out that the net effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to negate the effectiveness of lump sum compensation benefits. It would negate the effectiveness of educational and medical benefits. It would negate the certainty and the predictability provided by this legislation in title VIII in the Victims of Terrorism Compensation Act.

There is no way that Congress can predict when a situation will arise and how much appropriation will be required? Even if the situation arose, in all likelihood the Congress would not react quickly. It did not with respect to the Iranian hostages, and I might add at this point that when the Hostage Relief Act passed in 1980, a year already had elapsed since those individuals became hostages in Iran. Finally, in all likelihood, Congress would not enact a sufficient appropriation, and then, as a result. We would terminate the benefits prematurely. The educational benefits and the medical benefits triggered in this legislation would terminate because we did not provide an adequate appropriation.

The thrust of this legislation is to provide some certainty, some assurance, some peace of mind to the hostages and to the hostage family members. If there is anything that we learned from the Iranian crisis, it was this: The hostages thought about their family members first; for their health for their safety and their welfare. If we want to grant them peace of mind in coping with a perilous situation then we provide this in an entitlement form.

If we decide that we are going to create the family benefits contingent upon congressional approval, then there is no way that they will have the assurance of receiving these benefits in a timely fashion.

In the final analysis, the House has to decide whether or not we are willing to provide hostage relief. If we mean what we say, then let us enact effective legislation, but let us not gut the mechanism by which we effectively provide this relief.

That is what we are saying here today, members of the Committee. I believe we have to consider it very seriously. If the gentleman's amendment passes, we might as well eliminate title VIII. We might as well eliminate the certainty and the assurances that title VIII provides.

I think we have an obligation, a moral obligation as a country, to recognize the hardships that these individuals have faced and have endured.

Finally, one last comment. I think it is tragic that 5 years have elapsed and we have yet to provide compensation to the Iranian hostages. You ask why? Because of the controversy involved in determining the level of compensation. That is why I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we must have this mechanism so that we can ensure the kind of certainty that these people deserve.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman. I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. MICA and Mr. FASCELL and Congresswoman SNOWE and Congresswoman SCHROEDER who have been so forceful in seeing this legislation come to pass. I chaired a subcommittee that heard the legislation as well, for employee compensation benefits.

I want to make one quick point. First of all, I think any Government worker who risks his or her life, and many of them do day in and day out, who was held hostage, is entitled, and I want to underline that, I do not happen to think that is a dirty word, I think it is an important word. They are entitled to benefits for themselves and their families. Absolutely entitled to that.

I am astounded that anyone would disagree with that. That we would want to have these people held hostage to the whim of one committee or another. If we are creating an entitlement program, it is very, very belated and we should have done it a long time ago.

No. 2 is that this entitlement comes out of existing funds, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania's amendment violates Gramm-Rudman because it does not come out of existing funds. So as ingenious as he sometimes is about these technical issues, his amendment violates Gramm-Rudman.

Our bill does not. I would just simply like to say that all Americans realize that the taking of American hostages is frightening, it is sad, and unfortunately, our Government workers, those workers that we sometimes treat very disparagingly, and our military personnel and their dependents, are very often considered easy prey by political terrorists who seek to influence our foreign policy.

We know and we live through this as Americans day in and day out with the anxiety for our hostages.

Now, if we cannot pass a bill that does not violate the existing law that entitles these individuals who risk their lives, some of whom have already done this, and hopefully this will never happen again, but if it does, we ought to supply the kinds of remuneration and educational benefits, medical and health care, psychological counseling and this interest bearing savings fund that would involve their pay while they are held hostage.

Now, surely we can do that for these courageous people and hopefully we will never have that situation again, but my heavens, I am just astounded by this amendment. It violates Gramm-Rudman. I hope we soundly reject it, because it really guts the essence of the bill.

Mr. Chairman I rise in support of H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act. The bill has been the subject of hearings by both the Foreign Affairs Committee and my own Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee. And, while we would like to avoid the issue of terrorism, it is a cold reality in our society. H.R. 4151 would provide needed compensation to those who are victims of terrorism directly, and the family members who are forced to wait and pray for relief.

The taking of American hostages is frightening and sad. Unfortunately, U.S. citizens, Government employees, military personnel, and their dependents are considered easy prey by political terrorists who seek to influence American foreign policy.

While such tactics are repugnant and should be denounced and actively discouraged by every nation, state-sponsored terrorism continues, disrupting peace and stability in the world. Terrorists have resorted to murder and torture to seek political gain. We must do everything within our power, individually and as a nation, to stop such vicious activities. We must also never forget the needs of those who suffer the horrors of terrorism.

The legislation before the House today would expand and improve upon the benefits provided by the Hostage Relief Act of 1980 to Federal civilian and military employees who become victims of hostile action directed against the United States.

Among its many worthwhile provisions, the bill would direct that a hostage's pay be deposited in an interest-bearing savings fund and that captives and their families be compensated for medical and health care, educational benefits, and psychological counseling. Certainly, such benefits should be provided to Government employees who suffer the physical and mental strain of being held hostage, and of facing a violent death at any moment.

Our goal is to permanently end terrorism but, until this goal is achieved, Government employees who are captured and tortured, and the families of those killed, must be properly compensated for their heroism and sacrifice for our country.

Sad as it is to say, certain Government employees perform duties in extremely hazardous conditions and, sometimes, pay the ultimate price to enforce the laws of our Nation. It is time that we exercise our moral responsibility and provide the proper benefits to those civilian and military workers whose lives are placed in jeopardy by international terrorism. One need only recall the sorrow of the families who remain waiting after 1 year to hear from their loved ones being held in Lebanon to realize that the need for H.R. 4151 is eminent.

I urge all my colleagues to vote in support of H.R. 4151.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, the normal procedure is each individual is allowed to speak for one time, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman can be recognized for another period of time.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I will not object at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of arguments out here and I think some of them need to be rebutted just a little bit, because we are hearing a lot of people indicating that this is just a mere technicality and they do not understand why this should be done. The mere technicality we are talking here is deficit reduction and the program we committed ourselves to.

For the gentlewoman to contend that this amendment is a violation of Gramm-Rudman is just wrong. It is the bill that has had to get a waiver from the Rules Committee. My amendment required no waiver. It came out to the floor and it required no waiver. It is perfectly in order to do.

It is just a case once again of the big spenders are at it. We are looking for another reason to spend money without looking at what we are doing.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. Surely, I yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman agree that this bill provides for funds that are already existing? Does the gentleman agree to that, yes or no?

Mr. WALKER. This bill evidently does.

Ms. OAKAR. Will the gentleman agree that his amendment does not?

Mr. WALKER. No.

Ms. OAKAR. That it provides for new funding?

Mr. WALKER. My amendment, I would say to the gentlewoman, requires that Congress vote on the money before we spend the money.

Ms. OAKAR. That is for new money, is that not true, not existing money?

Mr. WALKER. No. My amendment provides for no new money at all. My amendment simply says, I will say to the gentlewoman, that around here we ought to vote for the money before we spend the money.

The gentlewoman wants us to start a pattern of spending money without us having to vote on it.

Ms. OAKAR. That is absolutely not true.

Mr. WALKER. That is precisely what has got us in trouble over the years. The chairman of the committee comes out here and tells us that the reason why this is perfectly all right is because they went to the Budget Committee and got a waiver. The Budget Committee around here gives waivers to everyone. That is the reason why we have overspent our own budgets over the last 5 years by $160 billion, because we constantly get this pattern of the Budget Committee going beyond the Budget Act.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I am glad to yield to the gentlewoman. Apparently she does not want me to make my statement.

Ms. OAKAR. The gentleman knows and I know and everyone knows that the gentleman's amendment provides for new money and we are dealing in this bill with money already in the budget. The gentleman knows that, and let us not try to fool everyone.

Mr. WALKER. The gentlewoman is absolutely wrong. Here is what my amendment says: "and shall be effective for any fiscal year only to the extent or in the amounts provided in the Appropriation Act."

So what it says is that you have got to vote for the money before you spend the money. There is no money in my amendment whatsoever, none. It simply says that you have got to vote for the money before you spend the money.

Now, that is something we do not like to do around this Congress. We do not like to have to actually stand up and vote for this spending, so this committee has cleverly found a new way to provide for an entitlement program.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I would just say that we can continue to disagree about this. According to the gentleman, there is no new money in his amendment.

Mr. WALKER. No.

Mr. MICA. There is also no new money in this provision, according to the Budget Committee and according to the Rules Committee and according to this committee. There is no new money here.

Mr. WALKER. I have not contended there is any new money, I would say to the gentleman. What I have contended is that we are creating a new entitlement program that does not now exist and that we ought not to be in the process of establishing new entitlement programs. That is the only point this gentleman has made.

It is the gentleman's side that has raised the issue of new money. There is no new money anywhere. It is simply a question of process. Do you have a regular appropriations process or do you have an entitlement process?

I say that you ought to go through the regular appropriations process to spend money. We are told that this is just a small program. Well, $1.6 million is a lot of money in most families; $1.6 million is something that most families regard as a lot of money.

I believe they would think we should vote for that before we actually spend the money. That is not what we do.

We have heard about a moral obligation to the country. The moral obligation to this country is to stop piling up debt that we end up putting onto future generations. We do that enough. We are doing it with a new entitlement program here. It is time to say no to entitlement programs. It is time to say pay as you go and do so in a way that does not entitle the money, but says we are going to regularly appropriate the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide enhanced diplomatic security and combat international terrorism, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL CONFEREE ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 534, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1986

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be authorized to appoint an additional conferee on the part of the House at the further conference with the Senate on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? The Chair hears none and, without objection, appoints the following conferee: Mr. CONTE.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will notify the Senate of the change in conferee.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 2453) to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to increase the amounts authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 for commodity distribution, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of March 10, 1986.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KILDEE] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TAUKE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KILDEE].

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, both House and Senate bills addressed a shortfall in the Older Americans Nutrition Program. The House bill passed unanimously on September 24, 1985. The Senate bill passed unanimously on February 5, 1986. Under this program, The Secretary of Agriculture reimburses each State based on the number of congregate and home-delivered meals served under an approved title III plan.

The conference agreement maintains the level of reimbursement at 56.76 cents per meal for 3 years. The agreement also replaces such sums language in the House bill with specific authorization figures which the conferees believe will be adequate to allow reimbursement at this figure.

The conferees also dropped the House provision for a CPI adjustment in the rate of reimbursement for the third year of the bill.

I wish to commend my colleagues on the Republican side, particularly Mr. TAUKE. We have worked closely to make sure that we take care of this human need, while recognizing the fiscal needs of the Federal Government. This is truly a bipartisan agreement, both in the House and in the Senate, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI].

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am just delighted that we have reached this point in the history of this legislation. As the author of the original version of H.R. 2453 we are proud of the fact that we have effected these compromises. But that would not have been possible except for the tireless leadership of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Resources, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KILDEE] who was a tireless protector of the Older American Nutrition Program.

This bill averts the threatened reduction of some 2 million meals. What it does further, it would authorize $127 million for fiscal year 1985, $144 million for 1986 and 1987. In the end it will evoke a nationwide sigh of relief from thousands of dedicated people who are in the business of providing meals for elderly individuals in this program.

As we celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Older Americans Act, we go forward notwithstanding Gramm-Rudman in preserving the level of funding for the Elderly Nutrition Program so critical for the millions of elderly out there who require one meal per day to keep them functioning and nutritionally sound.

Once again I am grateful to the gentleman [Mr. KILDEE] for yielding this time and congratulate Mr. TAUKE for working in the bipartisan fashion with us.

It is important that we reach this point today before further chaos should envelope this all important program. The basic issue before us is will the Federal Government honor its commitment to the elderly nutrition program and provide a sufficient level of reimbursement per meal to avert catastrophic reductions in the service? Adoption of this conference report answers this question in the affirmative.

In essence, we are caught in a paradox caused by no other reason except that this program succeeds year after year and demand continues to exceed all expectations. At the beginning of fiscal year 1985, the Department of Agriculture anticipated that somewhere between 210–212 million meals would be provided under this program. The final figures are in for fiscal year 1985—the level—225 million. The existing law Public Law 98–459 says two things about the elderly feeding program. The first is that an adjustment for inflation in the reimbursement rate is to be made each year. The second provides us with the problem before us today section 312(b)(2) which says:

In any fiscal year in which compliance with subsection (a)(4) of this section costs more than the amounts authorized under paragraph (1) of this subsection for that fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture shall reduce the cents per meal determined pursuant to subsection (a)(4) for that fiscal year as necessary to meet the authorization of appropriations for that fiscal year.

As fiscal year 1985 began it was obvious that an increase in the reimbursement rate to 58.7 cents would run smack up against the authorization. Therefore the Secretary of Agriculture exercising his rights under the law moved to cut the reimbursement rate by 2 cents to the present 56.7 cents per meal. With the exception of a sporadic mailing of notices to States, this reduction caused mimimal problems as it occurred early enough in most planning cycles.

However, as last fiscal year progressed further and the number of meals continued to exceed expectations—pressures were mounting on the program because of the cap on authorizations in the law. I recognized this fact back in May 1985 when I introduced H.R. 2453 to lift the cap off this program for the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. My bill called for authorizations of $125.8 million for fiscal year 1985, $135.9 million for fiscal year 1986, and $147 million for fiscal year 1987.

The House acted quickly and passed this bill in September in modified form but still a sound bill. It provided sufficient authority in both fiscal years 1985 and 1986 to provide full reimbursement for past due claims and to keep the rate at 56.76 cents. It also provided for such sums as were necessary for fiscal year 1987.

In the ensuing months between House passage, Senate passage and this conference agreement, pressures continued to mount. According to data provided to me by both the national association of nutrition and aging service programs and the national association of meal programs, notices were being sent out to States and then from States to area agencies on aging and nutrition provides warning of a major reduction in the reimbursement rate. The rate would have been cut by more than 3 cents a meal.

Meanwhile the House and Senate Appropriations Committee at the behest of myself and other members of the House Select Committee of Aging and Education and Labor Committee acted to provide sufficient appropriations both to avert the reduction in the reimbursement rate and to pay all past due claims for fiscal year 1985. The result was an additional $12 million provided in the continuing resolution for the program. It was estimated that approximately $7 million of this would go to pay past due claims and the remaining $5 million would be used to maintain the reimbursement rate at 56.76 cents. This measure was signed into law but no sooner did it take effect and the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law kicked in and the program endured a cut of about $5 million. Meanwhile the President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposed a rescission of approximately $5 million. I am pleased that the chairman of both the House and Senate appropriations committees have advised me that they do not intend to accept the rescission and the funds would be released after 45 days.

However, unless final action were completed on this legislation, the department technically would be unable to spend the money since they lacked authority in the law. This conference report takes care of this problem and immediately will guarantee that all past due claims for fiscal year 1985 will be honored.

The other important consequence of this legislation is that it will preserve the existing reimbursement rate well into fiscal year 1986 if not throughout the entire fiscal year. This provides a funding level of $144 million for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 and includes the all important statement of intent that the measure seeks to ensure reimbursement at the 56.76-cent level.

Make no mistake about it. Failure to adopt this conference report will exacerbate an already developing crisis in the Older Americans Act Nutrition Program. My Subcommittee on Human Services estimates that for every 1-cent reduction in the reimbursement rate there is a corresponding loss of more than 733,000 daily meals. If the cut is 3 cents that means over 2 million daily meals. This would cause tremendous hardships across our Nation and would impact many needy seniors including those who are homebound. It should not be forgotten that the Older Americans Act by law is to a priority to the elderly in the greatest economic or social need. Economic need is defined as those seniors living at or below the poverty level. Meanwhile we know from other surveys we have conducted in our subcommittee that the average age of seniors in the congregate program is now 73 and the home delivered program is now 78. The point here is—these are people in need and a reduction of 2 million meals would hit many of these needy seniors.

As I mentioned earlier, the other important benefit of this legislation is that it will evoke a sigh of relief across the national aging network made up of State and area agencies on aging as well as congregate and home delivered meal providers. This bill ensures not only that they will get all that is owed to them from last fiscal year, it will allow them the almost forgotten luxury of planning to go back into daily life. They now know the intent of law is to provide a reimbursement rate of 56.76 cents for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

It is sometimes said nothing succeeds like success. With the Older Americans Nutrition Program, its success, indirectly, is the cause of its problem. We take a quantum leap forward with the adoption of this conference report in allowing the success not to be a source of penalizing.

I wish to commend all the House and Senate conferees for their work on this fine conference report. It deserves our support. I also commend the national aging organizations who have worked so closely with myself and others on this issue including the National Association of Nutrition and Aging Service Programs, the National Association of Meal Programs, the National Association of Area Agencies on Aging, and the National Association of State Units on Aging.

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the conference report which we are bringing before you is one which meets the objectives of virtually all of the Members of this body. I commend the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. KILDEE, and the other conferees for developing a piece of legislation which is, on the one hand, fiscally responsible but, on the other hand, meets the needs of senior citizens. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that for the past several years we have consistently underestimated the amounts of money that would be needed to fund these programs under the Older Americans Act. So we have come in for supplemental appropriations. This year I think with this legislation we are proving we are setting realistic authorization levels, yet at the same time we are freezing the reimbursement rates for meals over a 3-year period to ensure that we have fiscal responsibility, that we live within the constraints that all of us face as we attempt to set budget priorities, yet at the same time permit more senior citizens to have access to the meal program.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that virtually all Members of the House can support this legislation, and I would hope that they will do so.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAUKE. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report to accompany H.R. 2453, legislation to increase the Federal reimbursement for senior nutrition programs under the Older Americans Act.

The Meals on Wheels and congregate dining programs funded by this legislation provide invaluable nutritional assistance to older Americans. These programs are particularly important in Florida where more than 12.7 million meals are served annually. This includes 1 million meals served in Pinellas County by the dedicated staff and volunteers for Neighborly Senior Services. Through our continuing support of senior nutrition programs, we can assure millions of older Americans that they will receive daily, balanced meals.

The legislation we consider today will raise the spending limit on these programs so that the U.S. Department of Agriculture will be able to raise its per meal reimbursement to local sponsors of congregate dining and meals on wheels programs. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I know that last year we provided increased funding to allow the program to meet these projected higher limits.

Our action today will also enable the U.S. Department of Agriculture to reimburse State and local sponsors of these programs for more than $7 million in funding shortfalls last year. These shortfalls were the result of a greater than anticipated demand for meals. The 230 million meals served to older Americans throughout our Nation last year exceeds the Department of Agriculture's preliminary estimate by 17.2 million meals.

The expedient enactment of H.R. 2453 will enable the Department of Agriculture to spend those funds made available by the Appropriations Committee so that we can continue to fulfill our commitment to provide nutritionally balanced meals to older Americans in need.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, soon we will vote on H.R. 2453, a bill to continue providing reduced cost meals to our senior citizens. While this legislation concerns some seemingly mundane funding issues, it actually addresses a much larger issue: The role of the Federal Government and our commitment to do what is clearly the right thing.

As the English philanthropist, art critic, and sociological writer, John Ruskin said, "The first duty of government is to see that people have food, fuel, and clothes." If Ruskin was correct, then this legislation embodies one of the great challenges of democratic government.

This small step that we take today is a sign of our commitment to the elderly. This commitment must go beyond a hands-off policy on Social Security. It must go beyond support for legislation that aids the elderly in our specific districts. It must go beyond political rhetoric.

Our commitment to the elderly, while genuinely reflected in the above-mentioned areas, boils down to dollars. Do we have the will to back up the rhetoric? Will we work hard to see that the millions of senior citizens who lack adequate nutrition will be fed? Will we in this august body use our franchise to benefit those whose experience and wisdom has benefited us?

This is not a new issue. Shakespeare wrote of the "oppressed with two weak evils, age and hunger." A yes vote on this bill is a vote against the oppression of hunger and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, older Americans face a serious risk of having their entire life savings wiped away because of a catastrophic illness. Most of them don't have health care coverage which would protect them from a serious, long-term illness, such as Alzheimer's disease, cancer, a stroke, or a chronic heart condition.

Medicare, contrary to what many people believe, basically covers only the acute medical care needs of the elderly and does not cover extended, long-term care services. Medicaid, on the other hand, provides for long-term care coverage, but a person has to be destitute in order to qualify. Compounding the problem further, relatively few insurance companies—studies indicate between 16 to 25—provide long-term care insurance policies which are more comprehensive than MediGap policies. It is estimated that only about 50,000 elderly people are presently insured under such plans.

This leaves many older Americans unprotected and threatens their livelihood if they or their spouses suffer from an illness which requires long-term care services, whether the services are provided in the home, the hospital, or in a nursing home. They have nowhere to turn to help pay for catastrophic health care services other than their personal savings, which don't last long when faced with high health care costs.

For instance, a Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Massachusetts study found last year that two-thirds of single elderly people and one-third of married elderly people who enter nursing homes face destitution within 13 weeks because of the costs of care without adequate insurance coverage.

Congress needs to address the serious problem of the lack of catastrophic health care coverage for older Americans. For several months now, a great deal of attention has been focused on this issue, including a House Aging Committee hearing and a Ways and Means Committee hearing. I expect that more will be done in this area, including a thorough examination of legislation that Congressmen REGULA, COURTER, MCCAIN, BOEHLERT, and I introduced in the House of Representatives on March 6.

This legislation provides for a two-pronged approach to meeting the long-term health care needs of older Americans. First, the legislation would allow individuals to expand voluntarily their Medicare coverage to include catastrophic care coverage. It would include unlimited inpatient hospital care and would limit the number of deductibles a person must pay to two a year. Currently, Medicare provides full coverage up to 60 days, and partial coverage after 150 days of hospitalization and no coverage after that. In order to finance this extra coverage, Medicare beneficiaries would pay a modest premium increase.

Second, the legislation would allow individuals to establish individual health services accounts [IHSA's], which would be similar to individual retirement accounts. Under this legislation, individuals would be able to start a health savings account and deduct from their taxes the amount they contribute each year, up to $2,000 per year. Employers would also be able to contribute the same amount to an employee's account.

The money from these IHSA's could be used for care at a skilled nursing facility; care at an intermediate care facility; care at a licensed long-term care facility, care provided by a licensed home health care agency; payments for Medicare supplemental policies; and long-term care insurance policies.

The enactment of this legislation would go a long way toward insulating older Americans from unexpected health care costs. It would also alleviate their fears that their hard-earned savings would be eliminated if health problems arise. Finally, it would ensure older Americans that the rug would not be pulled out from beneath them if catastrophic illness strikes. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to act on this legislation to protect older Americans from the costs of prolonged illnesses.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support for the conference report on H.R. 2453, amendments to the Older Americans Act. This legislation will authorize the Agriculture Department to spend $127.8 million for fiscal 1985 and $144 million for fiscal 1986. These moneys will enable the Federal Government to reimburse States, and ultimately the groups that serve the needed meals for seniors under the Older Americans Act, at 56.76 cents per meal. Without this legislation, the authorization would be only 53 to 54 cents per meal, and this would have an adverse effect on the groups serving these meals. I would like to point out the relationship that these moneys we're authorizing today have with the moneys used in this program.

In Los Angeles County, 1.8 million meals were served through the congregate meal program and 500,000 meals were served through the home delivered program in fiscal 1985. This totals about 2.3 million meals served last year. The Federal Government reimbursed Los Angeles County approximately $1 million for the congregate program and $325,000 for the home delivered program. The State of California contributed about $675,000 and $160,000 respectively to the congregate and home delivered programs. In total, Los Angeles County received about $2.1 million from the Federal and State Governments for these meal programs. However, to bring these meals to the table, Los Angeles County spent in fiscal 1985 almost $9 million in the congregate program and $2.7 million in home delivered program, making county's expenditures almost $12 million for the year.

These figures just for Los Angeles County show how important these programs are for seniors in Los Angeles County and the country on the whole. The need for this authorization bill to maintain the Federal share in these meal programs is crucial to ensure that seniors receive meals they desparately need. Though this administration would like to eliminate all Federal funding for social programs such as these, the need for continued Federal funding could never be greater. The estimates for fiscal 1986 show a rise in the number of meals served in Los Angeles County, and this will put a further strain on the county to provide these meals. The figures for Los Angeles County show that non-Federal sources are contributing greatly to these programs, and a rise in the meals served will add to these costs. Without this legislation, local governments will be asked to spend more even on top of the increase which will accompany the rise in meals served.

The Federal Government must remain a partner in this program with local governments to provide these necessary meals, and this legislation will help ensure this. I urge all of my colleagues to support this conference report.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise in support of the conference agreement on H.R. 2453, the Older Americans Nutrition Program. The 1981 amendments to the Older Americans Act placed a cap on the commodity funds. The cap has proved too low, and last September the program ran out of money and hundreds of thousands of senior citizens were placed in jeopardy.

To avoid this shortfall once and for all, the conference agreement establishes a reimbursement rate of 56.76 cents per meal served under this program for fiscal years 1985 and each successive year thereafter. The amounts authorized under this compromise are $127.8 million for fiscal year 1985 and $144 million for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Speaker, the meals-on-wheels and congregate meals programs served over 553,000 meals in my district and 225 million nationally last year. These programs are among the most basic and humane programs we fund. The cooperation displayed in conference between myself, Chairman KILDEE, Mr. TAUKE, Senators HATCH, GRASSLEY, and MATSUNAGA is typical of the broad bipartisan support this program enjoys between Democrats and Republicans alike in both Chambers of Congress. I urge my colleagues in the House to pass this conference report. We must give an assurance to senior citizens who depend on this program that they will never again wonder if they might go a day without a hot meal.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 2453. The conference agreement establishes authorization of appropriations for fiscal years 1985 through 1987 which should insure that no less than 56.76 cents per meal in commodities, or cash in lieu thereof, is provided for congregate and home-delivered senior citizen nutrition programs.

The terms of the conference agreement provide for retroactive payment to the States of the 56.76 cents per meal in commodity support that was announced by the Department of Agriculture in February of 1985 and which State agencies and local nutrition program providers included in their fiscal year 1985 program planning. For a variety of reasons, the number of meals served at senior citizen nutrition programs was much larger than had been originally projected. Consequently, the USDA announced a significant reduction in the amount of per meal commodity or cash equivalent support that would be paid for all meals served in fiscal year 1985. Regrettably, the States are faced with an after-the-fact funding shortfall.

The conference agreement not only addresses the fiscal year 1985 shortfall issue, but also establishes fixed rates of commodity support for fiscal years 1986 and 1987. This should avoid any repetition of the fiscal year 1985 shortfall situation and should help States and local meal providers in their nutrition program planning.

In establishing fixed per meal commodity assistance rates, the conferees recognize that no adjustments will be made to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index for food away from home.

To stretch limited food dollars, the conference agreement strongly recommends that senior meal program providers consider participation in the National Commodity Processing Program. Through NCP, eligible recipient agencies are able to purchase certain manufactured food items containing surplus commodities furnished, free of charge, by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The value of these donated commodities is passed through to eligible local agencies, thereby lowering the prices paid for these manufactured or processed food items.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in agreeing to the conference report on H.R. 2453.

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report on the bill, H.R. 2453, just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT OF COLOMBIA, BELISARIO BETANCUR, REGARDING INTERVENTIONISM

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in a recent interview with the Washington Post, the President of Colombia, Belisario Betancur, condemned the interventionist activities in the Western Hemisphere of Cuba, the Soviet Union, and the United States. The President of Colombia observes that peace and freedom in Central America can only be achieved through negotiation.

I submit a transcript and translated copy of the President's remarks for the consideration of my colleagues.

BOGOTA,
March 14, 1986.

Congressman BILL ALEXANDER,
U.S. Capitol,
Washington.

DEAR SIR: According to our previous conversation of March 13th, I enclose herewith photocopy of both the documents we talked about. First there is the copy of the written answers given by President Betancur to a questionnaire sent by the journalist from the Washington Post. Second, there is a copy of the non-literal transcript of the interview that Mr. President granted to the same journalists.

I hope these documents will be of some help to you and please feel at ease to contact me if any further information is required.

Yours sincerely,

VICTOR G. RICARDO,
General Secretary.

INTERVIEW GRANTED BY PRESIDENT BELISARIO BETANCUR TO JOURNALIST BRADLEY GRAHAM FROM THE WASHINGTON POST, MARCH 7, 1986

(Non-literal transcript)

POST. New reference about Contadora.

PRESIDENT. I sincerely think that Contadora has good chances of reaching its goals. The Contadora group and the group of support (Brasil), Argentina, Peru, Uruguay) are representatives of all Latin America and we know that the Reagan administration is aware of the fact that Latin America has its own language. And that this language is expressed through Contadora. In fact, it is all of Latin America which does not like the Reagan proposal.

We are looking for the diplomatic way, for negociation. I consider that an initiative of a request for U.S. $100 million taken by President Reagan is wrong. We think that the way Mr. Reagan is taking is a way to which Contadora has already given an answer. As President Oscar Arias said, the support of Mr. Reagan is counterproductive. I know we can get more through negociation. One of the basic principles of Contadora is the non-intervention. Therefore we condemn the activities of Cuba, the Soviet Union as well as those of the United States.

POST. How do you evaluate the policy of the United States toward Colombia and Latin America during your presidential term?

PRESIDENT. I think that the tradition for respect and cordiality was kept between our two nations. As members of the TXE Contadora Group, we have sometimes had the impression that the United States could have done more to stop the Central American conflict. But we work with what we have, nowadays in better conditions, thanks, for example to the group of support composed by Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uruguay, and to the Caraballeda statements and to Guatemala. Our greater present concern, and it is well understood by Mr. Reagan and his team, is the future of the International Coffee Agreement, which is a bit weakened by statements given by American officials: We, producers and consumers must protect the agreement because it warrants the stability of our countries, not only for the solution of our domestic unbalances, but also to find a solution to problems as dramatic as that of the external debt. I repeat that I have confidence in that the Government of the United States can see the situation clearly and is aware of the necessity of supporting the continuity of the World Coffee Agreement.

POST. Which are the future perspectives of Contadora?

PRESIDENT. Contadora is no longer a policy governments but a position of countries, not only in Latin America but in the whole world. We started here in the region, to extinguish fire in the neighbors house, in order to prevent fire in our house. But the effort became worldwide, under the hallmark that "dialogue is better than fight". And this has been achieved, with difficulties. But keeping always in mind the idea of peace, of looking for solutions different from bombs and bullets.

BIG BAY AREA COCAINE RING TIED TO CONTRAS

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend her remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, during his speech for Contra aid, President Reagan said that, "profiteering through drug smuggling is a hallmark of the Sandinista dictatorship."

Today I have asked the President to reverse his Contra support, based on a documented story in Sunday's San Francisco Examiner, entitled "Big Bay Area Cocaine Ring Tied to Contras."

Through court records, the article exposes a cocaine ring that provided $500,000 for Contra groups in Costa Rica. One of those convicted testified that proceeds from the cocaine smuggling "belonged to the Contra revolution."

Unbelievably, Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Government returned $36,000 seized as drug money after one of the smugglers submitted letters from Contra leaders saying it was really political money for "the reinstatement of democracy in Nicaragua."

Now, I know that our President would not willingly support any government or potential government that engages in drug trafficking. Withdrawing the Contra aid request would allow the necessary time to find out all the drug facts and insure that our President, who believes the Sandinistas are drug dealing, is not actually supporting a replacement regime that is being financed by the drug dealing, law-breaking Contras.

Mr. Speaker, I include the article referred to as follows:

BIG BAY AREA COCAINE RING TIED TO CONTRAS

(By Seth Rosenfeld)

A major Bay Area cocaine ring helped to finance the contra rebels in Nicaragua, according to federal court testimony and interviews with the convicted smugglers.

Carlos Cabezas, a convicted smuggler who said he worked with two contra groups, testified that proceeds from his cocaine trade "belonged to . . . the contra revolution."

Jubo Zavala, another convicted smuggler, said in a phone interview from federal prison that he delivered $500,000 to the treasury of two Costa Rican-based contra groups. The "majority of it," Zavala said, came from cocaine sales.

Zavala and Cabezas were convicted in connection with the 1983 "frogman case," in which federal agents seized 430 pounds of cocaine as divers attempted to unload it from the Colombian freighter Ciudad de Cucuta at San Francisco's Pier 96.

Estimating the drug's street value at $100 million, officials called it the biggest cocaine seizure in West Coast history.

The contra connection is described in sealed documents, government wiretap transcripts and other court records obtained by The Examiner.

The sealed records show that the government returned to Zavala $36,020 seized as drug money after he submitted letters from contra leaders saying it was really political money for "the reinstatement of democracy in Nicaragua."

The records also contain allegations by Zavala's attorney—never substantiated—of CIA involvement in contra drug operations. The CIA denied this.

Invoking a classified information statute, U.S. Attorney Joseph Russoniello declined comment on allegations of CIA or contra involvement, and said the money was returned for economic reasons.

The contras, an assortment of groups based in Costa Rica and Honduras, are fighting to overthrow the Marxist Sandinista government of Nicaragua. The Sandinistas seized power in 1979 from the late rightist dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle.

Allegations of contra involvement in drugs have arisen in the current debate over President Reagan's proposed $100 million aid package to the Contras.

The Associated Press reported in December that Contras based in Costa Rica have engaged in cocaine smuggling and used some of their profits to finance their war against the Sandinistas.

The report quoted U.S. law enforcement officials but the State Department told the AP it was unaware of any evidence to support the charges.

When asked this month about any Contra involvement in drug trafficking, Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams told a congressional committee.

"I have talked to the DEA (Drug Enforcement Administration) and there is absolutely no evidence, not any accusation of any involvement with drugs by the FDN (one Contra faction). There was an accusation involving another group."

A State Department spokesman, Sandra McCarty, said yesterday the department had no knowledge of the frogman case and would have no comment. Dennie Brisley of the White House press office said last night that the president would have no comment on the case.

The president has said the United States has a "moral obligation" to support the Contras. His proposal for aid faces a vote by the House of Representatives on Thursday and the president is scheduled to take his case to the people tonight in a televised speech.

THE CONTRA CONNECTIONS

A quick guide to the contra connections:

Carlos Cabezas, 40, a former Nicaraguan attorney and Somoza air force man who says he worked with the Costa Rica-based Contra groups UDN-FARN and ARDE (Democratic Revolutionary Alliance). After his conviction as a leader in the cocaine ring, he testified that cocaine profits helped finance the contra war against the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

Julio Zavala, 42, a Nicaraguan native and San Mateo car salesman who was convicted as a leader in the cocaine ring. He says he delivered $500,000, mostly from cocaine profits, to a Contra official in Costa Rica. Prosecutors returned to him $36,000 seized as drug profits after he presented letters from two contra officials saying it was political money.

Doris Salomon, 26, wife of Zavala and one-time Bay Area fund-raiser for a contra organization. She arranged the letters for Zavala from contra officials. She was convicted for cocaine sales in San Francisco.

Horacio Pereira, a Nicaraguan businessman now living in Costa Rica, where he faces cocaine conspiracy charges He allegedly supplied cocaine to Cabezas and Zavala, and told Cabezas the profits would finance Contra activity.

UDN-FARN (Nicaraguan Democratic Unity-Nicaraguan Revolutionary Armed Forces). A Costa Rica-based Contra organization founded by Fernando "El Negro" Chamorro. Zavala says he arranged the Bay Area purchase of weapons for his group.

PCNE (Conservative Party of Nicaraguans in Exile). A Costa Rica-based Contra group. Zavala says he delivered cocaine profits to help PCNE and UDN-FARN fight the Sandinistas. A representative of the two Contra groups wrote a letter stating that $36,020 seized as drug money from Zavala was really political money.

AGE OF GUNBOAT DIPLOMACY IS FINISHED

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, for the record, here are yesterday's results from my district following the President's Sunday night speech: 129 constituents said they oppose aid to the Contras, 21 supported it.

Mr. Speaker, we are clearly on the road to war with Nicaragua.

The President wants us to believe that the nations of Latin America are quietly cheering him on. But last week the President of Peru said, quote:

An act of hostility and of intervention in Nicaragua will be an act of hostility and intervention in all of Latin America.

President Garcia went on to say,

I announce the decision of the Government of Peru, in the event that foreign forces invade Nicaragua, to break relations with the aggressive power and make all efforts in defense of a brother country.

Latin America has been trying to tell us, more and more forcefully, that the age of gunboat diplomacy is finished. When young Americans are sent to fight in Nicaragua, and Latin America boils over in anger, it will not be another Grenada. It will not even be the Bay of Pigs. It will be Vietnam.

I submit for the RECORD the text of an AP dispatch reporting on President Garcia's remarks and the response of the Argentinian Congress to which they were delivered:

BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, March 14, 1986.—President Alan Garcia of Peru pledged Friday to break relations with any country that invades Nicaragua and help defend the leftist-ruled Central American nation.

He did not name a potential invader, but his reference to the United States was clear. The Reagan administration supports guerrillas fighting the Nicaraguan government, which often has predicted a U.S. invasion.

"An act of hostility and of intervention in Nicaragua will be an act of hostility and intervention in all of Latin America," Garcia said in an hour-long speech to Congress at the beginning of a three-day official visit to Argentina.

"I announce the decision of the government of Peru, in the event that foreign forces invade Nicaragua, to break relations with the aggressive power and make all efforts in defense of a brother country."

His comments brought loud applause from the congressmen and other Argentine dignitaries in the audience.

"Some can say that in Nicaragua there is no pluralism, that the opposition isn't listened to, that there is no free press," the Peruvian leader said, reading from a text. "Others will respond with the argument that the acts being carried out have created such a situation.

"We firmly believe in pluralistic democracy. But no one, and much less anyone from outside Latin America, has the right to correctively judge a process arising to overcome a totalitarian dictatorship about which nothing was said earlier."

Peru and Argentina are among eight Latin American countries involved with the Contadora peace process for Central America. They have recommended demilitarization of the troubled region, including an end to U.S. aid for the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

HELP THE FREEDOM FIGHTERS IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. BARTON of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we saw on Sunday evening our President go to the American people and ask that this Congress support his request for about $100 million over the next 2 years in military and humanitarian assistance to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

At the end of the President's speech, he asked that the American people call their Congressmen and Senators to express their support for his request. Yesterday, in my four offices in the sixth Congressional District of Texas, and in my office here in Washington, we received over 100 telephone calls. Approximately three-fourths of those telephone calls were in favor of supporting the President; the remainder were in opposition.

So far today we have received 20 telephone calls, 16 in favor, 4 in opposition.

There is an excellent editorial in today's Wall Street Journal, which I am submitting for the RECORD, that puts the case very simply: Either we work to help those who want to help themselves stop communism today in Nicaragua, or we wash our hands of it and walk away.

I say we should vote to help the President. We should vote for the aid to the freedom fighters. We should allow those people to help themselves to fight communism in their own country.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 18, 1986]

CONTRA AID: THE STAKES

Even at this date in the contra debate, the Reagan administration's official position is that the purpose of military aid is to bring pressure on the Sandinistas to negotiate and hold elections. The Democratic opponents argue that something must be done to check the spread of communism in Central America, but that the means should not be military but diplomatic. This politesse on both sides obscures what is at stake in the contra vote.

There is not going to be a negotiated solution in Nicaragua; either it will have a Communist government or it will not. Who, after all, are the Sandinistas? They are a vanguard of Communists who appropriated the name of a local historical hero and captured an indigenous revolution in true Leninist form. They have driven Somoza's democratic opponents out of power and into exile, and are entrenching themselves with the full apparatus of a totalarian state—a military machine, block committees, secret police with Cuban and East German advisers. They are armed by the Soviet Union, and support insurgencies against their neighbors. There is no example of such a government negotiating itself out of power.

What is at stake in Nicaragua is precisely whether the Communist revolution is, as Lenin claimed, historically irreversible. U.S. interests are involved precisely because we are engaged in a historic competition with a Communist empire, a competition over differing views of man, a competition between the democrats and the totalitarians. Since the defeat of Hitler's totalitarianism, we have recognized that in today's world we can no longer retreat into isolationism, that we have no choice but to resist the expansion of the Communist empire.

Over that long period, our record is by and large a credible one. Usually we have been able to help keep new lands from falling. But after the failure of our strategically questionable and irresolute commitment to Vietnam, the Communists went on the march in the world once more, clamping Southeast Asia under the yoke and expanding their influence in the Middle East, Africa and Central America. More lately, we have been recovering the will and ability to resist. The turning point came before Ronald Reagan, with President Carter's outrage at the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The Reagan administration has been able to carry through the Carter administration's planned missile deployment in Europe, hold off the insurgency in El Salvador, and even, in the tiny case of Grenada, hand the Communist empire its first outright reversal. The result has been that, in places like Argentina and the Philippines, democracy is gaining in the world today.

Our strategic dilemma has been that the Communist reversals have been temporary and their advances have been permanent. We have not been able to help the Hungarians, Czechs or Poles when they rebelled against enslavement. We can do little for the boat people in Southeast Asia. We could do nothing at all for the Cambodians beset by the Khmer Rouge. In Afghanistan we can only raise the cost of Communist conquest.

In Nicaragua we now face a test, an incipient Communist totalitarianism in our own backyard. This is not Afghanistan or Vietnam, half a world away. The totalitarian apparatus is not yet fully entrenched; important resistance still comes from the church and from the contras. An outright Communist success would have immediate repercussions, keeping Central America in turmoil, diverting the U.S. from Europe and Asia and making life much more difficult for fledging democracies. (As indeed, Castroite subversion did much to check the spread of democracy in Latin America that looked so hopeful in the 1960s.)

The choice in the contra vote is not between military and diplomatic means. The opposition Democrats can talk of negotiation, but only to hide the real choice: Cut out losses, chalk up one more nation for the Communists and promise to do better next time. The administration can talk of negotiation, but only to hide the real choice: Keep up military pressure in the ultimate hope of toppling the Nicaraguan Communists.

What the chances of this are we cannot pretend to know, but it is galling to hear congressional opponents rest their case on its alleged impossibility. The contras were making substantial progress in 1984, until Congress pulled the rug out from under them. By all accounts, the Communist government is increasingly unpopular; if the contras start to gain there may be a popular uprising or defections from its own ranks. At least Col. Enrique Bermudez, contra military commander, is willing to say: "We have been able to resist and keep the pressure on the Sandinistas with no aid. With $100 million I am sure we can defeat the Sandinistas fast." One does not have to share his optimism to admire his spirit.

This brings us to two points. Col. Bermudez was a commander under Somoza, and somehow more ink has been spilled on the character of the contras than the character of the Communists. President Reagan now tells us that many of the supposed contra atrocities have been committed by Communist agents provocateurs. In Salvador, more U.S. aid quite predictably brought with it a better human-rights record. The Philippines proves Jeane Kirkpatrick was right; if we retain influence we can help steer countries toward democracy. If Col. Bermudez and other contras served Somoza, Mr. Marcos was long served by Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile, who put an army behind Corazon Aquino's election. And of course, the contras also include opponents of Somoza such as Adolfo Calero and former members of the revolutionary government such as Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo. Perhaps not all of the contras are democrats, but all of the democrats are contras.

Finally, there is the matter of American troops. The opposition Democrats say two things: that giving the contras aid commits us to sending troops, and that if Nicaragua becomes a Soviet base we can always send American troops. This has been eloquently answered by the editors of The New Republic: "Nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. army. Of course, American military involvement can never be ruled out. But destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguans hardly seems the way to prevent it."

The endorsement of contra aid by The New Republic was echoed in a broadside ad signed by, among others, such Carter administration national security officials as Zbigniew Brzezinski, David Aaron and Richard Holbrooke, "The Sandinistas have presented the Reagan Administration with a taunting challenge: either send U.S. military forces to save our democratic friends in Nicaragua, or yield to the consolidation of the first Marxist-Leninist state on the American mainland. We believe there is a better alternative: give Nicaragua's democratic resistance the support it needs to survive this totalitarian assault."

Contra aid is now backed by liberal magazines and Carter administration officials. It got the vote of the Democratic chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Dante Fascell. Democratic Chairman Les Aspin forced it through the House Armed Services Committee by voice vote. What remains to be seen is whether a blocking majority in the Democratic Party and the gerrymandered House of Representatives is still held by the remnants of the Vietnam protesters and critics of American imperialism. Outside of that group, we are approaching a consensus that whatever the odds on the contra aid succeeding in Nicaragua, the historic stakes are high enough to be worth a lot more than $100 million.

VACATING PERMISSION FOR SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that permission previously granted me to address the House for 60 minutes today be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order this evening, which is 1 hour and which is third in order. I ask unanimous consent that my special order be taken up first when the 1-hour special orders are reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] be allowed to proceed first with his 5-minute special order and that my special order follow immediately thereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

SPEAKER THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR., CELEBRATES 50 YEARS OF PUBLIC SERVICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, last evening 2,000 business, political, labor, and religious leaders gathered in Washington to celebrate the 50 years of service given to the people of the United States by the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.

To say it was a magnificant tribute, and a grand way to spend St. Patrick's night, is not to do it justice. From the witty and generous remarks of President Reagan, to the conferring of honorary Irish citizenship on the Speaker and his devoted and gracious wife, Millie, by Irish Prime Minister Garret Fitzgerald, to the praise and jest directed toward TIP by former President Ford, Senator TED KENNEDY and Bob Hope, the evening was one which will long live in the memory of the Nation's Capital. I have been to a number of testimonials over the years, but I cannot recall one, which matched the enthusiasm and warm glow of good feeling that was generated at yesterday's salute to the Speaker. It seemed to capture in mood the trait by which TIP O'NEILL's character is defined—that political contests must be pursued with intensity and skill, but not with a meanness of spirit or purpose. Last night we saw Speaker O'NEILL's determination to live by that code which won for him, not only a reputation as a master politician, but the affection of a bipartisan legion of friends and admirers as well.

There will be a host of other events honoring Speaker O'NEILL before his term in office ends. While I know he will be touched by them all, I believe that last night's tribute, attended by so many of the Members of this House and the Senate will always occupy a special place in his heart. It was an extraordinary moment for an extraordinary man, and it was a privilege for me to be able to share it with him and his family.

THE SANDINISTAS DO NOT WANT TO NEGOTIATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD], is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, there is an old copybook rule that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. The freedom fighters, the Contras in Nicaragua are defending the United States and its principles just as certainly as they are fighting for their own freedom.

I have been to Nicaragua, and to the adjoining countries. There is great support among the people in Central America for the Contra movement, and there is great alarm over the massive buildup of Nicaragua's Armed Forces to levels far beyond required for national defense.

The democratic nations in Latin America view the Sandinista military buildup as a direct threat to their security and they view the vote for the Contra aid in this Congress as a signal of U.S. commitment to maintaining the peace and stability in the region.

I am convinced that if we permit the Ortega government to remain in power, the export of communism to the rest of Central America is absolutely inevitable. The Sandinistas do not want to negotiate unless negotiation would give them additional time to consolidate their hold over the people of Nicaragua.

The Ortega government will not give up its dedication to communism or reverse its policies in exporting violence and suppression at home. History shows that these regimes do not change their spots if the Sandinistas threaten their neighbors now, they will not be easily persuaded to change. But the signal from Congress that the United States will do nothing to oppose them is a very, very dangerous one to send. It will hurt the people of the United States.

Let me talk for just a moment about the people in Nicaragua. How are their everyday lives changing under the Communist regime.

Tracey Thomas, a distinguished citizen and successful businessman in Arizona provided me with the results of an interview he had recently, last week as a matter of fact, during the course of a trip through Central America with a citizen of Nicaragua.

The Nicaraguan was temporarily in El Salvador at the time but was returning to his family in the capital of Nicaragua, Managua. What he had to say is important to the future, not only of Nicaragua, but to the future of the United States of America. The Nicaraguan is quoted as follows:

> You cannot see anything on the surface in the City of Managua that would disturb any casual eye or foreign visitor to the city. But what is important is what you cannot see or hear in moving around the City of Managua.
> No one there in Managua or in Nicaragua will talk to a stranger. They are afraid to do so, and why are they afraid? Because the Communist goverment has created Sandinista Defense Committees. These are neighborhood committees organized to spy on their neighbors. A typical Communist effort on taking over a government.
>
> Tomas Borge publicly self-confessed Communist, the Interior Minister of Nicaragua, has called for some 10,000 CDS's; the eyes and ears of the revolution. These committees, which are patterned after the Cuban Committees for the Defense of the Revolution, are a major force for ideological education, social control and security enforcement at the neighborhood level.
> The CDS's also work closely with the government security police in monitoring the activities of the Nicaraguan citizens.

The Nicaraguan said his children were Christian, that their religious and family values were being corrupted by the Cuban teachers, so he sent them out of Nicaragua. Two to Costa Rica, one to Germany, and two to San Francisco.

This man's nieces and nephews who remain in Nicaragua are beginning to turn against his brother's family, he said. They are being taught that the Sandinistas have the best system of government and that they are being taught Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist values.

> You had better not talk against the revolution when those children are around he said, because they might just tell the neighborhood block secret police.

The bottom line to all of this, of course, is that Nicaraguan Communist education is corrupting the young people and will ultimately destroy the family unit.

The Sandinista Youth 19th of July Movement grew out of a Nicaraguan revolutionary youth group. Since it is a system from primary school through the university level, its tactics include mob harassment, vandalism, political meetings that disrupt classes, and school expulsion of uncooperative students and faculty.

These Nicaraguan employees will talk but only in a safe environment on a 1-to-1 basis. He said:

> It is most important that the international community keep the pressure on the Sandinistas or force them to have truly free elections, if that is possible.

He also indicated that the United States must provide money, arms, and supplies to the Contra freedom fighters.

A GREAT AMERICAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker in the well, who remains in the well, is a great American, he is an outstanding Member of this House, he is soon to retire from this House, and we will sorely miss him.

He has an important statement to finish, and I will yield him my time.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his kind words and also for the time.

In speaking about the interview of my good friend Tracy Thomas with the Nicaraguan National, the Nicaraguan people, he said, will, of course, talk in a safe environment. But the important thing that the international community must keep in mind is that they have to keep pressure on the Sandinistas or force them into doing the things that will keep them from totally imposing communism on the Nicaraguan people.

The business and social community cannot survive, he said. That those within the country who still operate somewhat freely will have to leave the country, and the Communists will be able to accelerate their conversion of that country to a police state and a socialism consolidation of all economic and political activities.

The freedom fighters, the Contras, and international pressure to hold free elections are slowing the Communist process of consolidation over the people of Nicaragua. He said:

> This is just another report added to what we should already know, and it is also a report that I may say is corroborating evidence for my own travels in Central America and in the region and from others who have traveled there and made their reports and whose judgment I know is trustworthy.

So, my colleagues, I urge you, I urge you here in the House of Representatives to see the situation in Nicaragua as it really is. Let us provide assistance to the people in Nicaragua in their effort to promote democracy and through the Contras, which has been deceitfully stolen from them and let them enjoy the same freedoms that we do here in America.

If we do not, if we do not, the freedom within our own borders will just as surely be stolen from us as it was in Cuba, first, and in Nicaragua now. There is no question but what the Communist government, starting in Moscow, and going through Havana to Managua is totally dedicated to target, eventually the United States of America for a totalitarian Communist takeover.

I again thank the gentleman from the time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PORTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, it had been my understanding that rollcall votes are not held on days that there are State primaries. Had I not been in my district for the Illinois primaries, I would have voted "aye" on the motion to concur, "aye" on the motion to go to conference, and "no" on the motion to insist on the House position.

It is clear that the Senate version, produced after long negotiation with the President, saved $363 million more than the House version. For this reason, I would have supported the Senate version.

VISIT OF NINE UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES TO CENTRAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous matter on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, in 24 hours on the ground in Central America you cannot expect to learn everything, but you can learn some very important things. Eight of my colleagues and I feel that we saw, and heard, the latest details about the situation in Nicaragua and El Salvador. We do not pretend to have seen in depth every part of the current debate on U.S. policy in the area, but we did see enough to draw some conclusions.

We learned that Thursday's congressional vote on whether to provide $100 million to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua is an important vote to everyone in the region. The Communist government of Nicaragua regards it as an important vote on that government's future and sees a vote against the Contra aid as a vote for its position. Those in Congress who claim that their "no" vote is not pro-Sandinista have not listened to the Nicaraguan Government.

We learned that the congressional action is important to the democratic resistance within Nicaragua, not just the military arm of that resistance, but also the business, labor, church press, and political phases of the resistance, too. Anyone interested in keeping a flicker of liberty alive in what is a rapidly developing totalitarian society must acknowledge Contra aid as one part of a program for realistic pressure on the Communists to change.

We learned that our vote will be important to Nicaragua's neighboring states, in particular El Salvador. The facts are clear: When help from the United States increases violence in El Salvador decreases, and vice versa.

We learned that the Sandinista Communists are perfectly willing to lie. In our meeting with Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez—the acting president of the country at the time of our visit—we were presented with some outrageous falsehoods disguised as facts. For example, Ramirez claimed that there were no foreign fighting forces in his country and that Nicaragua received no shipments of Soviet bloc arms until after external aggression against it was underway. My colleagues will relate some additional lies told to us, but suffice it to say that those in the Congress who suggest talking to the Communist is the way to Nicaraguan settlement should consider the fact that we will be negotiating with people who do not deal in good faith.

We learned that human rights abuses are growing in Nicaragua and are committed by both the government and the Contras. But the pattern of systematic use of torture, imprisonment, and murder by the government on its political opposition is the growing trend, which is a fact acknowledged by the human rights group, the independent press and church leaders within that country. They say flatly that human rights violations by the Sandinista Communists are worse than they were under Somoza.

We learned that there are people of tremendous courage in Central America who are risking everything to be free men and women. President Duarte, in his fight to build strong democratic traditions within El Salvador, is truly an inspiration. And the people in Nicaragua who risk their lives, risk imprisonment, risk loss of property, suffer separation from loved ones, and make constant personal sacrifices to regain liberty are the people we should want as our friends. They are the people who asked us over and over again to bring a message back to the Congress that the United States must help them and help them now. I hope this report will be that kind of message.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that my recent trip to Nicaragua was extremely brief, I spoke to a sufficiently large crossection of people there to return more convinced than ever that the Sandinista government is engaged in a massive campaign of human rights abuses.

I am convinced also that this phenomena is not an aberration. Rather, it is an actual systematic policy that has been consciously adopted as an instrument of government. In a sense, this should not be surprising. Every totalitarian government uses intimidation to control its population. The Sandinistas are certainly doing all in their power to live up to this unholy tradition.

The startling growth in the number of prisons (and with it, of course, the prison population), the confiscation of personal and business holdings, the use of ration cards for the basics of life by which the Sandinistas blackmail their own population, the nationalization of radio and television stations and the amazing degree of censorship that the one remaining independent newspaper (La Prensa) is subject to are all parts of a pattern that ultimately force one to conclude that the Sandinistas are desperately trying to hide the horrendous conditions under which the Nicaraguan people now live.

Actually naming those common people brave enough to would literally put their lives in jeopardy. They live in enough danger and I will not further worsen those conditions. However, I was told enough horror stories by enough respected individuals in a position to know—as well as by real victims of Sandinista repression—to understand that the Sandinista government is as repressive as any known to the world.

As the debate on aid to the freedom fighters begins on the floor of the House, I will document further the points I have raised. For the time, however, let me say that I am convinced that the only hope for the Nicaraguan people's escape from this evil regime is for the U.S. Congress to immediately approve the President's aid request of $100 million.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, our interview with the editorial staff of La Prensa, the voice of the opposition in Managua, confirmed first hand the reports of massive censorship in the country. We also learned that several of the La Prensa staff had been kidnaped and beaten by the government for their independent views. Accordingly, the staff fears for their lives daily, but insists on attempting to tell the truth about the Sandinistas' deceptions.

This is the same La Prensa which was the leading spokesman for the revolution against Somoza. One of La Prensa's editors is Christiana Chamorro the daughter of La Prensa's editor whose assassination in 1978 provided the catalyst for the final push against Somoza. Ms. Chamorro is still firmly convinced that La Prensa is fighting for the revolution begun against Somoza.

The editorial board informed us of several means the Sandinistas are using to undermine the voice of the opposition. The Sandinista government regularly censors 40 to 90 percent of La Prensa's daily edition under a very rigorous schedule approval which threatens daily distribution. At least 7 hours is required for the censorship process after which the staff is required to reformat the paper so as not to reveal spaces which held censored articles. Once the paper is published, only 70,000 copies are allowed to be distributed. The editors added that demand always exceeds the supply.

During our tour of the La Prensa office we were shown the wall, made famous by the proponents of the Sandinistas, where censored articles can appear. This was typical of the sham information the Sandinista have fed the world community. The wall is a small space inside the office. Access to the wall requires the viewer to travel to the office which is now in a remote part of the city—hardly Main Street viewing. The viewer must enter the private property of La Prensa and take the certain risk of being observed by the Sandinista secret police. This is hardly what I call freedom of the press.

Finally, we were told about financial hardship which is about to force La Prensa out of business. Just as the viewers of the censorship wall risk observation, the government has informed businesses that they advertise in La Prensa at the risk of courting disfavor. Similar to the press, censorship has been extended to the radio and TV media. Under Somoza their were 50 radio programs and 3 TV stations throughout the country. Under the Sandinistas, there is only 1 source for radio and TV programming.

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening at the Ambassador's residence, the delegation had an opportunity to meet in an informal setting with business, labor, political and professional leaders in Nicaragua. Included in the group were individuals representing the Confederation of Unions, the Confederation of Professional Association, the Chamber of Commerce of Nicaragua, several of the political parties in opposition to the government, the Cattlemen's Association, as well as individuals we met with earlier in the day from La Prensa and the Permanent Commission on Human Rights.

The setting provided an opportunity for us to discuss individually and in a relaxed environment the issues confronting Nicaragua. A few of the key points that emerged from our conversations would include the following:

First, there is almost unanimous agreement that the economy of Nicaragua is in very bad shape. I could find no one who would suggest other than that the economy is much worse off today than it was under the previous government. Interestingly, they make the point that the conditions are bad not just for business leaders, but for everyone. We were told that Nicaraguans now spend an enormous part of their energies simply to survive—standing in line for food, queuing up for buses, trying to get the simplest sort of business license.

Second, the United States embargo on trade with Nicaragua has not had any significant impact on making economic conditions worse. The generally accepted view seems to be that conditions were bad before and they don't seem perceptibly worse today.

Third, there is no semblance of a democratic labor movement. The right to strike is forbidden. To get a job or ration cards one must belong to the government controlled union. In other words, the independent unions have been virtually destroyed.

Fourth, private business continues to exist, but is subjected to an increasing amount of petty harrassment. Taxes are confiscatory, there are transaction taxes imposed on every piece of business that is conducted, the bureaucracy and licensing process imposes petty harrassment that makes the normal conduct of business virtually impossible.

Fifth, the situation is growing worse and with the Communist government exerting total control over education, over all forms of communication, and over all the levers of power in a society, the opportunity to change the system grows less with each day. The number of youngsters who will know any system other than the Communist government will diminish with each passing year. In this regard it is important to note that 75 percent of the Nicaraguan population is under the age of 25.

Some of the business and labor leaders were critical of their former colleagues who have fled Nicaragua, leaving them to face a hostile government with diminished numbers. Whatever the merits of the case that caused others to leave Nicaragua, one cannot help but be overwhelmed with the personal courage of those who have remained behind and face such a bleak future.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of March 14, the congressional delegation met with Cardinal Obando y Bravo. Seated at his side were Bishop Bosco Vivas and Monsignor Bismarck Carballo. We spent about an hour-and-a-half with the cardinal and learned a great deal about the problems facing the nation and the Catholic Church. It should be noted that approximately 85 percent of the population is Catholic.

Cardinal Obando first gave us an overview of Nicaragua as he sees it today. In his words, "The economy at the present time is totally destroyed. Hunger is beginning to be felt by all. There is a serious shortage of food, spare parts and water." As a matter of fact, the rather nice hotel we stayed in did not have water the day we were there and we were told that the hotel was without water 3 days a week.

The cardinal said that there were certain North Americans working in his country with the government, such as the Maryknoll order of nuns. He perceived a pattern of wining and dining of the visitors and showing them a one-sided view of the country so that when they returned home they had not received a true picture of the country.

There has been great tension in the church and that tension has increased since October 1985, when the Sandinista government stepped up its attack on the church. On October 12, 1985, the government confiscated the church bulletin. All of the priests were forced to be fingerprinted and pressure was exerted upon laymen not to cooperate with the church. On January 1, 1986, the government closed the Catholic radio station because they did not broadcast President Daniel Ortega's New Year's Eve address. In addition, the government censored Catholic television programs, and that censorship was so widespread that even portions of the Bible were deleted.

The church has been denied the ability to have open masses any longer. The official Sandinista position is that you must give a 72-hour notice of such an event and secure a permit, but the permit is invariably denied. What was particularly disturbing to some of us was that even the masses have to be pretaped and submitted to the government for censorship or the mass could not be held.

The cardinal pointed out that under Somoza the Catholic Church was never cut off from conducting its activities. They had their own radio station, television station, pastoral letters and other activities that have been taken away from them by the Sandinistas. As Cardinal Obando stated, under Somoza there were many atrocities, but the church was able to denounce those atrocities on television channels 2 and 6 and on the radio stations as well. Today, that is obviously impossible.

The church has had to be extremely sensitive and low key in its criticism of the government in order to avoid the bloodshed that might result. In response to one question posed by us, the cardinal answered cryptically, but with a great deal of significance, "You must understand I am answering these questions in Nicaragua, not in the United States."

The cardinal said he would recommend, first of all, a sincere dialog. But in order to be able to do that, he said, you have to communicate, which is not possible under present conditions. As a matter of fact, he pointed out that a suggestion had been made in a pastoral letter that a conference be held with all Nicaraguans.

He said that it is clear that the majority of the people in Nicaragua are not happy with the existing government. However, he said "We would prefer, as Nicaraguans, to control our own destiny without the help of the United States, but that is not possible as long as there is the presence of the thousands and thousands of Soviet bloc representatives, Cubans, Tupamaro, Montenegro, PLO and others."

Cardinal Obando listed the number of priests in Nicaragua, approximately 320, and the number of nuns, in the vicinity of 500. We asked how many of the priests and nuns were involved in supporting the Sandinistas. He indicated that less than 10 percent, and closer to 5 percent, supported the government and that the priests are actually violating their religious obligations to obey the cardinal. They have created a government-favored church called the Popular Church and the friction continues to build. Foreign Minister Miguel d'Escoto has publicly called the cardinal a traitor and it is difficult to respond due to the severe censorship and lack of communication.

One of the clergymen stated that when the cardinal says mass, the church is crowded to overflowing capacity, whereas when the Popular Church conducts its masses, very few people attend. They even have to recruit people to make it look as though it has appeal. The clergy present quoted Interior Minister Borge as saying that the Catholic Church is the biggest enemy of the government, a statement that was published in the monthly bulletin called La Publica in December 1985.

The government claims that the cardinal is alone and without support. In an effort to prove that that is not true, the priests have circulated petitions supporting the cardinal and virtually everyone attending masses have signed the letters despite the peril that it might place them in.

The cardinal told us of the case of Luis Mora who worked for La Prensa. When Obando was made cardinal and returned from Rome to Nicaragua, he was met by a group that called themselves the Committee of 400. Luis Mora was part of that committee and was also covering the event for the newspaper. For no other reason, he was arrested and imprisoned for many months and was only released after the recent intervention of President Jimmy Carter.

When we were about to leave, the clergymen, in response to a question, told us that last month 8 catechists, ages 16 to 18, had been raped by Sandinista troops. These young women had volunteered to go out into the fields and preach religion to the people who were not able to attend church because the churches were long distances away.

Also just before leaving, one of the members of the delegation asked the clergy whether they were ever threatened with arrest or actually arrested. Monsignor Bismarck then told the story that occurred on August 11, 1982. While home, there was a pounding on his door with men shouting that they were there from the National Security Police. He opened the door, they came into his home, pointed a gun at his head and forced him to disrobe. He was then ordered outside where a television camera was waiting. Pictures of the Monsignor, completely naked, were taken and shown that night on a government television station stating that he was caught in bed with a woman. Monsignor Bismarck was arrested, jailed, beaten, and tortured.

We then asked Bishop Vivas whether he had any threats and he stated that yes, he had been arrested, jailed, and beaten as well.

The significance of these stories is that we were ready to leave and would not have known about those incidents were it not for the fact that a Congressman, while departing, had asked the question. To us, it was an indication that the clergymen were not there to propagandize, but simply to answer any questions that they could.

It was obvious to all of us that, indeed, the Catholic Church probably is the biggest enemy of the Sandinista government since the people are devout Catholics. Given a choice between what is being told to them by the Sandinista government or the church officials, it seemed clear that the people would believe the Catholic clergy first. Recognizing this, the Sandinistas have embarked on a program of terrorism, censorship, and harassment against the Catholic Church.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, my impressions on our meeting with the Sandinista Acting President, Segio Ramirez, were, first, that he was lying and, second, that he was visibly irritated at having to meet with us at all.

The most blatant lies began at the opening of our meeting when he stated they were a "nonalined nation" and said it was propaganda that they were a Marxist-Leninist government. The lies continued in response to a question about Cuban pilots flying Soviet-made helicopters when he said, "No Cubans fly our planes." He also stated that the Sandinistas did not begin receiving arms from Cuba or the Soviets until faced with external aggression. Mr. Ramirez denied that the Sandinistas were exporting arms or violence. The lies continued when he was pressed by BOB DORAN about the number of political prisons in Nicaragua. First he said there were no prisons—then he changed his statement to say there were no clandestine prisons.

The only truthful thing he said was that they would not negotiate with the Contras "as long as they were receiving financial aid or any assistance given to them from others" and he ended by saying "then you will see a fundamental change and there will be no need for repression," in other words—the Contras will have to surrender.

When one of our members, PAUL HENRY attempted to engage in a dialog about their refusal to sign on the Contadora process he responded angrily and said we shouldn't ask complex questions—only questions he could answer with a yes or a no.

Mr. Ramirez was arrogant and tyrannical when we discussed free elections which had been promised to the people. He said the party was preparing a new constitution and would be holding elections. He said the present Government was elected until 1991. He was corrected by one of the others at the table that it was only until 1990.

El Nuevo Diario, one of the two pro-government daily newspapers, said this morning:

According to several authorized sources of information and analysis, the visit to Nicaragua by the group of Republican representatives supportive of Reagan's policy is a clear propaganda maneuver that allows them to drape themselves in the presumed internal "moral authority" that is given by being—if only in passing—on the ground with the facts, so afterward they can "justify" their decision to vote for the $100 million for the Contras.

My final impression was that time is on the side of the Sandinistas. I sensed that they feel that all they have to do is wait—until after the vote—then they can completely crush the opposition with no threat of retaliation from the United States. The only reason they met with us is to show that they were "committed to dialog." They also let it be known after our visit that they were irritated at having to become involved in what they described as a propaganda exercise designed to improve the chances of Reagan's proposal in Congress.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I joined the recent task force visit to Nicaragua in order to have the opportunity of meeting with representatives of the religious left who are engaged in missionary activity in the area. Accordingly, I broke away from the official delegation meetings on the evening of March 15, and spent roughly 5 hours with the following individuals:

Mr. James Ludema, missionary of the Christian Reformed Church—of which I am a member—who serves church development programs in Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, and El Salvadore. He is associated with CEPAD, the ecumenical agency which coordinates the missionary activities of a substantial portion of the more conservative, evangelical Protestant missionary effort in Nicaragua;

Don and Ria Reasoner, formerly associated with a Jesuit ministry in Nicaragua, and now engaged in coordinating visits for various ecumenical church groups visiting the region; and

Douglas Sullivan, associated with the ecumencial Baptist Seminary in Managua.

I selected these individuals in particular because they are generally more sympathetic to the conservative theology of evangelical Protestantism than most ecumenical groups, and yet have joined with the religious left's criticism of administration policy in Central America. Some general observations of our visit follow.

First, I think it fair to say that each of these individuals was surprised to learn that the general consensus of opinion in regard to the Sandinista regime was that we are dealing with a solidly Marxist government. I noted that the general range of debate in the United States today was not over what type of government presently exists in Nicaragua, but what to do in response to that government.

Second, These individuals were generally skeptical of reports regarding the deliberate export of revolutionary subversion being supported by the Nicaraguan Government throughout Latin America. They tended to view the militarization of Nicaragua and its militant foreign policy as a defense against American-supported interventionism into the internal affairs of the Sandinista government, and the self-determination of the Nicaraguan people.

Third, in some instances, it seemed that their criticisms of American foreign policy in the region extended beyond disagreement per se to outright antagonism. Indirect reference by one of the individuals to Voice of America broadcasts as "propagandistic," for example, troubled me as to the general political reference from which they were operating. On being shown the March 14 Washignton Post editorial regarding the Contra debate in Congress, and the New Republic article of March 24 in support of aid to the Contra forces, they were dismissed as "conservative organs" of public opinion by two of these individuals. This suggested to me either a political naivete, or a strongly left-of-center orientation to the political world.

Fourth, they all strongly repudiated claims made by some of the civil resistance leaders with whom we met that the Sandinista government presently enjoys the political support of only about 25 percent of the population.

Fifth, I was at the same time struck with the impression that they were much less aware of the factual assessment most of us in Washington have made in regard to the historical record of the Sandinista regime, that is, accepted statements of the Government in regard to Marxist commitments, generally accepted restrictions on political pluralism, specific interference with free religious expression, increasingly accepted patterns of human rights abuses, et cetera.

Over and over again, I asked myself "How could these individuals who are well-educated, living within Nicaragua or Central America, come to such starkly contrasting assessments of the factual situation than those of us in Washington (regardless of differences of opinion as to how we should best respond as a matter of foreign policy)?" Trying to solve this puzzle, I venture some observations:

First, as Protestant missionaries, their work has been largely with the dispossessed. Their work has traditionally been less institutionally structured than that of classical Roman Catholic clergy—as is the Catholic "Peoples' Church" within the overall rubic of contemporary Catholic mission activity in the region.

As such, their concerns are more directed toward the character of "social revolution" as opposed to the political consequences. And their institutional ties to the relatively small middle class and traditional elite structures by which American foreign policy seeks to mediate democratic reform have been mostly nonexistent.

Second, although they live in the country of Nicaragua, they actually have much less opportunity to accumulate "hard information" and to interactive policy discussion based on factual information. Removed from—and distrustful of—the civil democratic opposition to the Sandinista government, they assess American foreign policy strictly in terms of the military opposition with which they must contend in the countryside where they work.

Further, the information they receive is predominantly filtered through the Government-controlled press. Although I am sure they make good faith efforts to try to sort fact from fiction in filtering out what they are allowed to know about the situation within Nicaragua, the toll of receiving only selective information through propagandized channels is significant.

Third, a significant number of the individuals to whom they minister have either directly or indirectly suffered intimidation or human rights abuses via the military opposition. The fact that this is a small country with a small population based on very traditional, extended family structures magnifies the intensity of feeling generated by these abuses. At the same time, they are likely not to be aware of the intimidation or human rights abuses which the Government imposes on the middle class and/or traditional elites who oppose the Government.

In summation, these individuals tend to weigh their assessment of the Sandinista government in regard to the "social revolution" it espouses as opposed to the nature of the political system—with its oppression of the middle class opposition and traditional elites—which is developing in Nicaragua. They are concerned over the social consequences of the revolution at the expense of political oppression.

What is the significance of this distinction for our continuing debate on policy toward Central America? I would argue that it is fundamental in terms of long-term consequences. For in the cases of Nicaragua and El Salvador, we have two "models" for reform. In Nicaragua, we have a "social revolution" seeking to render a new political order. In El Salvador, we have a "political revolution" seeking to render a new social order. In the former, the ends justify the means. In the latter, the end is recognized as being invariably conditioned by the means.

I would also add two ancedotal notes of other observations which I thought particularly helpful in understanding the overall context in which our decision on Contra aid must be made.

One State Department official made the observation that one of the reasons for the "democratization" taking place in Latin America was the perceived "virulent anticommunism" of the Reagan administration. While President Carter awakened the conscience of the world to human rights abuses in Latin America, the anticommunism of the Reagan administration provides a climate of trust in which the authoritarian regimes in Latin America can move to the political center without fear. It is, ironically, this same perception which makes it hard for President Reagan to capture the political center in terms of domestic politics in America.

Finally, an observation by President Duarte of El Salvador. President Duarte referred to the "Nicaraguan Domino" in an intriguing fashion by suggesting that it was the threat of Nicaraguan revolution which encouraged democratic evolution throughout the remainder of Latin America.

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Speaker, We met for over an hour with President Duarte. In attendance also was the equivalent of the Speaker of their House of Representatives and also the leader of the majority party.

President Duarte began by describing the sharp contrast in progress between Communist and non-Communist countries. This was evident to all of us in the comparisons between Managua and San Salvador. Managua has almost no construction going on, and there were a considerable number of vacant lots and other buildings that had either been gutted after the last earthquake and not repaired. In contrast San Salvador was growing with a great deal of construction. We were informed that most of what was happening was being funded through private capital, indicating how the free enterprise system can work if allowed to and how much progress can take place in a free and open society.

While we saw a lot of poverty along the way, we caught a glimpse that people had something to work for. Duarte's new austerity program has created some difficult times, but is showing success and is putting the country on its feet economically. On the day we visited a march occurred in San Salvador in support of these Government policies. It was estimated that at least 100,000 people turned out to show support. Duarte noted in comparison, that the right and left extremists together only drew 7,000 to 10,000 people at a demonstration they had against his policies. In referring to the sharp contrast between Communists and non-Communists he indicated that you can see a real difference between a democratic revolution and a Communist revolution. Duarte summarized the status of El Salvador as tough, but adding that many things are improving and was especially proud of the development of a qualified and loyal military.

He talked a little bit about atrocities that are occurring within his country. The guerrillas are still attacking the infrastructure of the country and killing innocent people including children. He's convinced that the weapons come from the U.S.S.R., through Cuba to Nicaragua and then into El Salvador. He said that Nicaragua is the center and sanctuary for the guerrilla movement. Daniel Ortega, said Duarte, now supports and will continue to support the guerrillas and has stated such.

Referring to the Contadora process, President Duarte said that he supports all efforts of good will, but that all negotiations should be for the benefit of the whole region, or they will not be meaningful. In one of the more meaningful statements he made, he said that Nicaragua is the country that is trying to manipulate the Contadora process. That they do not want the Contadora to succeed.

In response to whether or not El Salvador is helped or hurt by providing aid to the Contras, he responded that for El Salvador to have a barrier between them and Nicaragua is good. That there are two types of barriers, political and physical. He indicated the political is the best type of barrier, but if you can't have it then a physical barrier is needed. Since military aid to the Contras has been cut off, the pressure on El Salvador has increased and been felt, due to the ability of the guerrillas to consolidate their forces more easily.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my previously requested special order for 30 minutes be vacated and that I be granted permission to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

CIVIL RIGHTS IN NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, last night over the period of almost 60 minutes I read into the RECORD the greater portion of a report by Wesley Smith, a Mormon missionary who has gone to Nicaragua over a series of times over the last few years and has made reports on the violations of human rights and most recently on the prison system existing in Nicaragua. His most recent report that again I read the major portion of into the RECORD last night is dated March 13, 1986. I had hoped to finish that report tonight, but it does not appear that that is going to be possible. Instead of reading the entire remaining 10 pages, which I think are extraordinarily significant and very, very telling about the abuse of human rights and just tyranny of Nicaraguan citizens in that country by the existing government, I would just reiterate the conclusion of this report, which reads, again by Wesley Smith, the Mormon missionary:

> Since 1979 the Sandinista Government has used the prison system as a means to intimidate, control and subjugate those Nicaraguans who do not ideologically support them. In the State Security prisons Nicaraguans are tortured into accusing themselves or other prisoners. Such accusations serve as evidence in Sandinista run tribunals. In such tribunals Nicaraguans are condemned to long prison terms without due process of law.
> With the exception of Cuba, Nicaragua has the largest population of political prisoners in Latin America and far surpasses Latin American countries in the number of prisoners relative to its population.

It is a small country with only 3 million people and by this account there are 11,000 to 13,000 political prisoners in Nicaragua, approximately 50 percent have received judicial process. Of the 2,500 convicted by the People's Anti-Somoza Tribunal, 95 percent were convicted of crimes with evidence obtained from the prisoners themselves or other prisoners while in prison—in other words, they were just kangaroo courts. Such evidence against those prisoners include prisoner-signed statements against themselves, accusations of prisoners against other prisoners and accusations made by state security police from evidence gathered during interrogations.

Rather than listing or reading the entire remaining 10 pages, I would like to also add that there is a list of some of the accusations most commonly used to condemn prisoners. They include, and these are what these people are put into prison for months at a time under subhuman conditions, I read in a number of statements about those horrible conditions that exist in the various prisons throughout Nicaragua, but the evidence that sends them to these prisons includes selling grain on the open market, refusing to join the militia—that is what causes these people to be thrown in jail without charges and under horrible conditions; selling certain food stuffs on days when it is prohibited, professing counterrevolutionary ideologies, usually religion; investigating abuses by the Sandinista government; organizing civic opposition against the state—that is a terrible abuse; criticizing the government—another terrible abuse; giving food to Contra groups, peasants frequently give food to Contra groups passing in their areas. That can send you to prison for an enormous amount of time, possibly even cost you your life.

Refusal to work on government run properties, refusal to attend CDS, that is the local Communist organization block meetings; refusing to conduct neighborhood vigilance, involvement in general counterrevolutionary activities and past participation in the defunct Somoza guard, which of course no longer exists.

The report is compelling and I would say to my colleagues that I have a copy of the report available in my office if anybody would like to see the entire thing, or I would be happy to make copies for my colleagues.

I would add, well, rather than conclude, let me just read quickly the final statement of one of the prisoners who was thrown into El Chipote prison in the middle of the night. He says:

I was taken to the prison "El Chipote" in the middle of the night. As we got close to the Intercontinental Hotel I was told to put my head to the floor of the car which I did. I was conducted into the prison which is located at the top of the hill behind the Hotel. They took all my personal information and then one compa [Sandinista soldier] took me to a cell no more than 32 inches wide.

I felt like I was going to suffocate and after about 15 minutres I started to cry. They then took me and put me into a larger cell that had four beds in it. It was totally dark in this cell as well. At noon the next day we were taken out of "El Chipote" and sent to Las Tejas in Matagalpa. In Matagalpa we went for four days without water. We were given gallo pinto [rice and beans] to eat but the food was spoiled. I was number 7009 and my father was number 7007 because I had an opportunity to see him at the other end of the hall during one occasion. He was released after 15 days in Las Tejas. I was never taken before a judge or tribunal but they repeatedly said we had been condemned for four years.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its indulgence.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE JACOB JAVITS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Congressman SAM STRATTON and I, as chairman and vice chairman of the New York congressional delegation, arranged this special order in honor of the life and accomplishments of our departed friend Senator Jacob Javits. Jack lost his 5-year battle with Lou Gehrig's disease on Friday, March 6, at the age of 81.

For many Americans, Jake Javits' name meant hard work, attention to detail and moral courage. His 24-year tenure in the Senate—the longest in New York history—was filled with accomplishment. During this period, he led the battle for civil rights, authored the War Powers Act and the Pension Reform Act, and shaped the face of every labor bill considered by the Senate. After his defeat in 1981, and despite a painful battle with Lou Gehrig's disease, Jack remained politically active. He believed that as a national figure he had a unique opportunity to educate America regarding neurological diseases. To this effort he committed the remaining years of his life.

Senator Javits believed that he didn't "belong only to himself" but that he had an obligation to the society which "protected him when he entered the world, which taught him, and which supported and nurtured him." He firmly believed that he had an obligation to repay the society which allowed him to rise from a position of poverty to national prominence.

For 24 years, Jacob Javits dedicated himself to serving society through his work in the Senate. For the last 5, he dedicated himself to promoting the cause of the physically disabled. By his example, he taught us the value of public service.

Mr. Speaker, I knew Senator Javits well. During most of my service in the House of Representatives, Jack served in the Senate. It was a pleasure and a deep honor to have worked closely with him over those many years. As Senate Majority Leader DOLE stated at Senator Javits' funeral:

Without doubt he'll be remembered as one of America's all-time great U.S. Senators. He was a man of integrity and compassion and he'll be missed.

New York has a proud history of supplying this Nation with many of its greatest statesman. But Senator Javits does not belong to New York alone. Senator Javits, his courage, his spirit, and his love of life belong to all Americans. He was truly one of our greatest Senators and he will be sorely missed.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON], for taking this special order to pay tribute to Senator Jacob Javits, who as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] has already indicated had served in the U.S. Senate from New York the longest tenure of anyone from that State, 24 years, and in addition to that, I am sure that not many Members recall that Senator Javits also served for 8 years in the House of Representatives.

He also served 4 years as New York State attorney general in the administration of Gov. Averell Harriman and in the years that he served both in the House and the Senate Jake Javits was one of the State's greatest vote getters.

He was also a very conscientious Member of both the House and the Senate and one of the most articulate. It seemed that he also appeared in every debate. He always had a substantial contribution to make and as the gentleman from New York has already indicated, has been the author of a number of important pieces of legislation.

He was deeply concerned with the matters of foreign policy. He was one of the authors of the War Powers Act and I think Senator Javits considered that as one of his greatest accomplishments.

In addition to that, he also, as the gentleman from New York has indicated, was the author of the ERISA legislation which made certain that private pensions in businesses would be available for those who were expecting them and were entitled to them in whatever might be the circumstances of the company itself.

He was also an outstanding member on the Education and Labor Committee.

His power in the Senate was one of intelligence and articulate ability.

I can remember when I was mayor of Schenectady that Senator Javits would come annually to a Rotary Club dinner or to a chamber of commerce meeting and would discuss in great detail what was going on in the House and in the Senate.

There is one thing that many people may not realize.

□ 2040

Senator Javits was a very active person. He was an outstanding tennis player, and as a former Member of the House, he swam in the pool every morning.

It was only as it became difficult for him to swim that he began to recognize the illness that cut him down.

The one thing that I think some of us who knew Jake Javits well was that he often took himself a little bit too seriously. He did not seem to have a sense of humor, but suddenly, when his 75th birthday came along and he was honored in the Senate Caucus Room by his associates and his colleagues, he began to mellow and really laugh at himself as well.

The funeral that the Senator had in New York City at the Central Synagogue was one of the biggest funerals that I have seen and attended, and it brought forth an outstanding collection of individuals, the Attorney General of the United States, Attorney General Meese, who incidentally indicated that when he had his own troubles, Senator Javits gave him some legal advice that eased his situation.

Former President Nixon was in attendance, walked in quietly. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, Governor Cuomo, Gary Hart, Mayor Koch, I think a lineup of individuals who had been touched by the life and by the intellect of Jake Javits.

As his daughter said in her remarks, "Daddy, we are going to miss you." He said, "No, you will remember me."

In fact, the outstanding comment that was made by those who spoke at the funeral was that perhaps Senator Javits' greatest tribute was his courage in fighting the illness that eventually brought him to his end. He was constantly here on Capitol Hill lobbying for the things that he was interested in, and he had a smile on his face, as his aid would push him around in the wheelchair. He was an outstanding individual and we will all miss him.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, today I join my distinguished colleagues in paying tribute to an outstanding and unique American, Jacob K. Javits. Senator Javits' contributions to the Nation and the world will long be remembered and hopefully emulated. While I never had the privilege of serving with Senator Javits in this august body, he was a friend and an exemplary role model for those of us in public service. His dedication and love for mankind became more apparent to me each time our paths crossed on joint House-Senate business, and on the numerous other occasions I was privileged enough to be in his company.

He was truly dedicated not only to the people of the great State of New York, but to all the people of our Nation. Senator Javits was a courageous man who stood firm in his beliefs and fought for the advancement of life, liberty, freedom, and justice for everyone. He was the ideal public man whose life and deeds made him an inspiration to us all. Even after he became physically disabled, he never ceased in his efforts to promote understanding and participation in our system of democracy. He gave us strength, courage, and hope for a greater America. For this, the Nation will be enternally in his debt.

I join my colleagues in extending my condolences to his family. Senator Javits will be sorely missed by everyone, but his memory will live in our hearts forever.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to thank our distinguished colleague, the chairman of the New York Republican delegation, the gentleman from New York, Mr. HORTON, and the dean of the New York delegation, Mr. STRATTON, for reserving this time to pay tribute to one of the outstanding legislators and political leaders of the 20th century, Senator Jacob Javits.

With the passing of Jacob Javits earlier this month, we have lost not only one of our Nation's leading statesmen, but one of the true giants in the history of New York State, and of the Congress of the United States.

Having served as a U.S. Senator longer than any other individual from New York in history, Senator Javits was known as one of the chief architects of the civil rights legislation in the 1950's and 1960's, as a staunch and consistent friend of Israel, and as a champion of the labor movement. It is a telling tribute that, in the early 1970's, a confidential poll of congressional staffers ranked him as the most intelligent legislator on Capitol Hill at that time, and as one of the most effective.

I first came to know Jacob Javits from the time he was attorney general of New York State while I was employed as an assistant attorney general. At that time, I personally became more familiar with his genuine concern for human rights, for protecting the downtrodden and for justice for all.

It is a bitter irony that, although Senator Javits was ranking minority member on both the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee and the Committee on Labor and Human Relations at the time of his defeat in 1980, he was prevented from serving in the Senate as a member of the majority party which would have enabled him to chair one of these Senate committees. Nonetheless, his contributions were well beyond those accomplished by most of his colleagues.

As a four term Congressman, as a State attorney general, and as our Senator for nearly a quarter of a century, Jacob Javits set such high standards for New York State that it will be difficult to emulate. He will be sorely missed.

Jacob Koppel Javits was born on May 18, 1904, in a grimy tenement building on Manhattan's Stanton Street. The new century was a confusing time for young, urban Americans—especially for a son of Austrian Jewish immigrants—but Jacob Javits made the most of it. Like most young men of the time, Jacob Javits had to go to work to help support his family at the age of 11. However, his parents stressed to him the need for an education and insisted that he stay in school.

After graduating as senior class president from Manhattan's George Washington High School, young Jacob worked as a lithographic-supply salesman and a bill collector, while attending New York University Law School at night. Following admission to the New York State bar in 1927, Javits and his older brother, Ben, formed the law firm of Javits & Javits, which proved over the years to be one of Manhattan's more successful and respected law firms. His compassion for the downtrodden, undoubtedly learned during his childhood, was tempered during his years as a defense attorney.

Javit's father was involved in Democratic politics during the Tammany Hall days. Javits was not impressed with Tammany, for he became an early and ardent supporter of Fiorello LaGuardia's successful anti-Tammany campaign for mayor in 1933. As a Republican, Mayor LaGuardia fashioned a coalition of Republicans, anti-Tammany, reform, and liberal Democrats and various ethnic groups. Jacob Javits had indeed learned New York politics at the hands of a master. Upon his return from military duty in World War II—Javits had risen to the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Army—he campaigned hard for the unsuccessful reform candidate for mayor in 1945. Although this campaign was unsuccessful, Javits was rewarded with the Republican nomination for Congress in 1946 in a district that had not elected a Republican for over a quarter of a century.

Jacob Javits confounded political observers by winning that first House contest by 6,000 votes, and further amazed the political establishment by retaining his seat 2 years later by defeating a Tammany-financed candidate, the brother of the incumbent mayor of New York City.

Recognizing his vote-getting appeal, the Republican Party rewarded Congressman Javits by nominating him for State attorney general in 1954. His opponent was Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., the holder of a magic name in New York politics. Not only did Jacob Javits' victory confound the political pundits once again, he was the only Republican to win election to statewide office in 1954. In fact, Javits' total vote was the highest number of votes received by any candidate for any office in the United States that year.

Two years later, he defeated the then mayor of New York City and son of a former U.S. Senator, Robert F. Wagner, Jr., to begin the longest tenure of any U.S. Senator from the State of New York in history.

In 1962, seeking a second term in the Senate, Javits again became the biggest winner anywhere in the United States, and became the first Republican to carry New York City since President Calvin Coolidge in 1924.

On June 24, 1966, not quite yet to the halfway mark of Javits' 24-year service in the Senate, he was the subject of a Time magazine cover story. Portions of that article so convey the mood and style of Senator Javits during that era that I would like to insert them into the RECORD at this point:

As a legislator, Javits resembles a Stakhanovite squirrel. He is a member of five committees and, at latest count, 19 subcommittees, and the chances are that he knows more about what is going on in each of them than any other member, including the chairman. Michigan's Romney refers to him as "the busiest man in the Senate," and the label fits. Much of his time goes into what he calls "our unseen work": the unheralded, rarely acknowledged chore of shepherding a bill through subcommittee, committee, and finally the full chamber.

Though no law bears his name, Javits' legal experience and debating skill have left their imprint on countless bills, including such landmark legislation as Medicare (he offered an amendment covering those without Social Security) and the 1965 Voting Rights Act (he and Bobby Kennedy got through an amendment that emancipated New York's Puerto Rican population by waiving literacy requirements in English for Spanish-speaking Americans who have attended U.S.-flag schools). Javits makes no obeisance to the titular authors of the laws he has helped to shape and enact. "I really pulled that one off," he says, or "I did an excellent thing setting that up."

In an institution where verbosity is a virtue, Javits is probably the greatest virtuoso of them all—at least since Hubert Humphrey departed. "He knows the facts on everything," says Marion—and he can summarize them in a few thousand choice words at a moment's notice. Back in 1961, Javits was orating on an immigration bill that he considered unjust when Rhode Island Democrat John Pastore tried to gain the floor. "Let me finish," pleaded Javits. Pastore looked up at the chamber's high ceiling, rolled his eyes dramatically and moaned: "The Senator never finishes."

When he isn't talking, Javits is thinking. He is one of the most prolific idea men in politics, with a range of interests and enthusiasms that would defy an indexer. He has sponsored a thriving private-enterprise plan for Latin American development (ADELA) and is trying to launch similar ventures for Greece and Turkey. He is chairman of the NATO Parliamentarian's Economic Committee and an oft-heard advocate of greater political and economic cooperation within the Alliance. He speaks regularly and perceptively on the problems of Germany and of Viet Nam. On the domestic scene, he is an authority on issues ranging from Medicare to middle-income housing, civil rights to civic beautification, the arts to the sciences. New Yorkers Javits can even wax oracular about agriculture. "Ask him something about apple-growing," says New York State G.O.P. Treasurer Bill Pfeiffer, "and you would think he had been growing them all his life."

Empty Seat. When in Washington, Javits is up and about in time to reach the House gym soon after its early morning opening, spending 15 minutes in the pool or working out at paddleball or handball. If he can find a partner, he plays tennis, but he may soon run out of partners; in excellent trim (he weighs 175 lbs., claims to be 5 ft. 10 in. tall, but appears to be at least an inch shorter than that), he is a tough, agile player who gives no quarter. Saunaed, showered and stretched, Javits slides into his dark beige Mustang convertible (license plate MBJ-1 for his wife) and zips off to the Senate, whose own gym does not open until 10. By that time, Javits has usually met several delegations, sat in on a committee hearing and dictated any number of letters to the pretty secretary who trots at his side through the Senate corridors.

In 1968, Jacob Javits was elected to his third term as Senator from New York, again by a substantial margin. This time, he was opposed by the same gentleman he had defeated for a House seat in 1948, Paul O'Dwyer, the brother of the former mayor and an outstanding civic leader in his own right.

By now, Jacob Javits had become a living legend in his own time. His expertise in the field of human rights and in foreign affairs had become highly respected throughout the Nation. His sponsorship of the monumental War Powers Act, for example, helped assure its passage. By the time of his condidacy for this fourth and final term in 1974, Jacob Javits was the last surviving public official of his generation in New York. His unwavering support for Israel, and his insistance on equal rights for all Americans, made him a beacon of stability in troubled times. His renown and respect only increased during the balance of the 1970's.

Mr. Speaker, all of us from New York and many of our colleagues throughout the Congress have lost not just a colleague, but also a dear friend. Ever since my days as assistant attorney general in the New York Department of Law headed by Attorney General Javits, I found Jack Javits always willing and eager to lend a helping hand to anyone who sought it.

To his wife of 38 years, Marion, to his daughters Joy and Carla, and to his son, Joshua, we extend our deepest condolences. They can be justly proud of his monumental accomplishments and his contributions to our Nation.

Jacob Javits' passing represents the loss of a giant, and the end of an era for our Nation.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues from the State of New York who are pausing today to honor the memory of one of our Nation's greatest legislative leaders, and one of the finest statesmen New York has ever produced * * * the late Senator Jacob Javits.

The rise of Senator Javits to political prominence is an inspirational story that puts the fictional tales of Horatio Alger to shame. He was the product of the New York's Lower East Side and, as such, the heir to a proud American tradition which has allowed so many men and women to rise to heights as mighty as their talent, their character and their intellect will allow. In the case of Jake Javits, that was mighty high indeed.

As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I deal each day with the same issues that Senator Javits confronted and mastered in his long career as one of the leading spokesman in Congress on foreign policy.

Quite frankly, I disagreed with Senator Javits' position on many of those issues; that too is part of New York's tradition of contentious politics.

I do agree, however, with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle that the name of Jake Javits' always personified the highest standards of intellectual honesty, personal integrity, and unselfish devotion to public service.

I also agree wholeheartedly that Senator Javits made an enormous contribution to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to the very way this Congress addresses foreign policy, and set a precedent for excellence that is a model for us all.

Over the years, we New Yorkers, I suppose, sometimes took for this giant presence on the New York political scene for granted. We realize now in retrospect that such leadership is as precious as it is rare, and we pay homage to it.

And despite his many years of visible and outspoken leadership, who among us was prepared for the sheer physical courage Jacob Javits displayed in the final years of his life.

Senator Jacob Javits left his impression on more than just our political life.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, it is said that a man is his own circumstances; that which surrounds us will shape what we are to be.

Truly Jacob Javits was a man of his own circumstances.

He was a man of New York State: Serving four terms in the House, then as State attorney general, finally as U.S. Senator from 1956 to 1980.

He was, in his words, "a man of the Senate," who loved deeply the institution, its issues, and its work, serving on as many as five committees and nine subcommittees at one time.

He was a man of his times; witness his passionate hard work and dedication to civil rights, labor rights, pension reform, foreign affairs, and the role of Congress in the national defense.

Finally, he was a man of courage Despite an energy-sapping illness, he pressed for the rights of the terminally ill as his last cause.

Through intelligence, independence, and outstanding public service, Jacob Javits was indeed a man of his circumstances, He was a special friend and a great statesman. He will be missed.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, Jacob Javits was a legislator's legislator. He was industrious, wise, courageous, and compassionate. Although a man of great vision himself, he understood that politics is not an arena of theory but the art of the possible; and so he was tireless in seeking creative yet practical solutions to problems which affected our State of New York, the Nation, and the world

Senator Javits was a healthy skeptic about short range quick fixes, and sought instead to fashion sound and lasting policies; he was also not afraid to espouse unpopular positions when he believed them to be right.

For most New Yorkers, Senator Javits was also a singularly appropriate representative for our State, with its existing diversity of cultures, ethnic backgrounds, and economic, educational, and social constituencies. He represented New York with profound understanding of its diversity, and with great effectiveness.

Senator Javits believed deeply in our institutions of representative government, and deeply loved the Congress in which he served so faithfully. He was a devoted public servant and a great gentleman, and we will sorely miss his presence among us.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend our colleague, SAM STRATTON for organizing this very timely special order in honor of a great man, Senator Jacob Javits.

Jake Javits was a fighter. From his early battles in the Senate to his final battle with Lou Gehrig's disease, Jake was a man who never gave up. He is a symbol of all that is good in the U.S. Congress, and all that is good in the human spirit.

His four terms as a Senator were good years. He was a Republican who struggled long and hard for what he believed in—the right of all Americans to a fair chance and a decent living. He stood out among his fellow Republicans by advocating causes and taking positions that were frequently considered to be too liberal. This was Jake's style. He never let political expediency get in the way of what he thought was right, and he always stuck to his guns.

Jake Javits came up the hard way. Born and raised in a tenement on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, Jake knew what it was like to be a working man trying to make ends meet. He received his education in the school of life, knowing the common man better than most of us. Let there be no doubt about it, Jake was part of a rare breed.

Mr. Speaker, we all mourn Jacob Javit's passing. I was proud to know him personally, and was especially proud that he was a fellow New Yorker. He was a truly great man, and a national leader. God bless him.

Mr. KEMP, Mr. Speaker, the State of New York has a right to lead the Nation in mourning the passing of our Senator, Jack Javits, but all Americans feel the loss as deeply as do we.

I'm sorry that Jack did not live to celebrate the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution which begins next year. Because one of the finest of our constitutional treasures is surely the institution of the Senate, where a line of great individuals have served the national interest as U.S. Senators who would be the envy of any nation in history—individuals like Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, and on into the 20th century—La Follette and Norris and Robert Taft, and, yes, Jack Javits. The genius of our Founding Fathers in creating the Senate was in deliberately designing it to bring out all the potential in the great men and women who serve the American people as Senators.

I've talked about Jack Javits' record as a Senator before; others will mention it later. Today, though, I wanted to say a few words about something that we tend to skip over in eulogies: Jack as a party leader. Maybe we don't talk about this so much because we think that to be a "partisan" is somehow not like being a "patriot." Whatever is the case with others, in Jack Javits' case they were the same thing.

Jack wrote a book in 1964 he called "Order of Battle." He described it as "a Republican's call to reason." I think that book was his most sustained effort to spell out his philosophy of Government; publishing it was an act of patriotism as he understood it.

You don't have to agree with every single line in it to see that in his two decade old book Jack said a lot that speaks to our current condition in 1986. His prophetic words ring true because he chose to write about issues and problems that are always with us in our liberal democracy. We are always driving to improve ourselves as liberal democrats (small "L," small "D") and get closer to the democratic ideal while recognizing that ideals by their nature can never be completely realized.

Jack wrote about economic growth as a priority: "To secure an adequate increase and wide distribution of the whole complex of things which come under the standard of living, the Nation must commit itself to higher and higher productivity through vigorous and fundamental economic growth."

Creating jobs and expanding economic opportunity, according to Jack, are important for everyone, but especially for improving the condition of America's minorities. I'm proud to say that Jack's career as New York's Republican Senator and well before was marked by his intense concern for expanding equal rights and equal opportunity to all Americans. In what he called the "Third American Revolution," the civil rights revolution of the 1960's, Jack said that "the Republican Party has an opportunity to lead the Nation in doing three things simultaneously. The first is to remove all barriers to employment based on artificial factors such as race. The second is to enable the Negro to acquire through proper training programs the skills which modern industry now demands as a condition of employment of any man regardless of the color of his skin. The third—and overriding—task of leadership is to stimulate the orderly growth of the nation's economy so that new chances for employment will open up for the mass of new workers who want to work and have employable skills."

He had no problem in showing that it was inadequate to eliminate deficits at the cost of holding back economic expansion. He criticized FDE for forcing a balanced budget in 1937 in such a way that it created "the jolting recession of 1937–38." and he drew a lesson that we must not forget as we work on ways to reduce excessive spending today: It is the economy . . . that must first be balanced, and the balancing of the Federal Budget will follow."

One of Jack Javits' lifetime themes over his entire political career was the danger of a narrow partisanship in foreign policy. I said that he was a "Partisan," a Patriotic Partisan. But he did not believe in partisanship for its own sake, especially where America's national security and defense were concerned. He said that his position was identical to an earlier Republican internationalist's, Wendell Willkie, who "steadfastly refused to make political capital out of the foreign affairs issue." He strongly approved of Willkie's statement that "the party that pussyfoots, opposes and obstructs during a national emergency writes its own death warrant; but the party that cooperates and encourages national unity survives with colors flying." In fact one major reason Jack decided to run for office was that he supported the bipartisan internationalism advocated by Senator Arthur Vandenberg, whom he called "the great Republican leader of the Senate during and after World War II."

As a party leader, one of Jack's central concerns was expanding the base of the Republican Party—bringing our party into the ghettoes and barrios and union halls as well as the chambers of commerce and suburban and rural areas of America. He was always happy to say that our party appealed to the businesses of America, but his vision was still broader. His hope was to update Lincoln's vision for our time.

After he left the institution of the Senate he loved so much, we saw perhaps the finest and rarest of Jacks qualities, in the dignity and patience with which he bore his last illness. For a man who loved to speak, it must have seemed almost unendurable when he labored to speak a few sentences; yet he did endure it with a courage that touched everyone who saw him.

I can't help ending my remarks by repeating what his legislative assistant, Patricia Connell shakow, recently wrote that Jack said at a Javits staff reunion 2 years ago. "You are my legacy to the next century," he said, "and after I'm gone I want you to do three things for the old man. Love your country. Don't be afraid to stick your neck out. And take a chance on the young, as I once took a chance on each of you."

We are—all of us, Republicans and Democrats—Jack Javits' legacy to the next century. I join all my colleagues in mourning his death, celebrating his life and recalling his lasting heritage to the country and the world. My profound respects and love to Marian Javits and the Javits family.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding man and legislator, Senator Jacob Javits. To the end, Senate Javits used both his intellect and his physical strength to continue to accomplish the goals in which he believed, setting a stellar example for all of us.

Senator Javits was the epitome of what a legislator should be. He was not a man to be stymied by legislative difficulties or to allow his judgment to be clouded by party politics.

The Senator was not only a towering intellect, but he was also an eloquent spokesman for the causes in which he believed. He was the author or one of the principal architect of much of the major legislation enacted during this generation, including the War Powers Act, the civil rights legislation of the 1960's, ERISA, and the creation of the National Endowments for the Arts and the Humanities, to name but a few.

Not withstanding all of the causes in which Senator Javits was involved, he was also a master of legislative detail. I know from the 3 years in which our respective tenures on the Hill overlapped, that the Senator was never too busy to take a call about some minor, technical amendment that would make a pending Senate bill work better in New York State or New York City, and he would thereafter be at the right place at the right time and do the right thing to make that amendment pass.

Senator Javits' career in the Congress serves as an outstanding example against which all who come afterwards can measure their legislative work.

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, a concerned and caring voice for the people of New York, and indeed all of the United States, has been stilled. While we mourn the loss of Senator Jacob Javits, those of us who worked with him and respected him can be proud to have been associated with such a man.

As a Member of the U.S. Senate, Jacob Javits set an example of integrity in both his public and private lives that all who serve in Congress would be hard pressed to surpass. He was a man of his convictions, and he led the fight on legislative battles with the same remarkable courage that he displayed in refusing to yield to illness.

I was fortunate to serve with Senator Javits in the New York delegation during my first term in the House. He lead by example; he was a man of courage. He was a public official who inspired us by continually showing that it is worth fighting for causes that you believe in. During his career in the Senate, he proved this by fighting for causes that put him in the middle of heated controversy. In his private life, he fought against an illness that tried to keep him from his commitments, and in his struggle, he made the battle his last major cause. He brought new public awareness to his illness, with a dignity characteristic of his years of public service.

Mr. Speaker, we will miss Jacob Javits. We will miss his wisdom, his integrity and personal courage. We join with New Yorkers, and citizens from across this Nation, in extending our sympathy to his family.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in his eight decades on this Earth, Senator Jack Javits displayed a singular commitment. Till the end, he was curious, intrigued and passionately aroused in addressing the concerns of his very broadest constituency—his fellow man.

Jack Javits' picture hangs in my office—near it an engraving of President Lincoln. Throughout his career, Jack's view of public service embraced Lincoln's progressive spirit that: "The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all or cannot so well do for themselves in their separate and individual capacities." Jack wrote toward the end of his 24 years in the Senate that "Government steps in when—and only when—private means are inadequate to do the job." This describes best his highly developed recognition of what was just, right and made common sense.

I am proud to have known Jack Javits as a friend and colleague. Newspapers, airwaves and Government chambers everywhere have been filled with accolades for this truly great leader. He has been called a quick study—to me he was the quickest. His grasp of the most intricate issues in finance, foreign affairs, civil rights—deeply inspired. His enviable contacts with world leaders infused his agenda with an unmatched creativity.

Jack was dedicated to free enterprise, yet nationally and internationally he worked for the oppressed. His inspiring example taught so many to care about those less fortunate than themselves.

Several times in the years after Jack Javits left the Senate, I sought him out for his wise counsel. I also sought him because I knew what he was and what he had accomplished for me and and so many of us.

Jack Javits was intelligent, gifted, compassionate, courageous—but there was more—he was an individual of integrity and a dignified man of principle.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, today we pause to remember Senator Jacob Javits of New York. Senator Javits will long be remembered as a skillful legislator who never forgot the advice of Proverbs to give voice to those who cannot speak. He was a consistent friend of those in our society who most needed his concern and assistance. He was a supporter of civil rights in the fullest sense of the word. He never forgot his own humble origins as he worked to protect those who were oppressed, regardless of the reason for that oppression.

Over the years Senator Javits frequently took the difficult stands which were not always popular. In the end, one cannot help to think that his practice of standing tall in the face of popular opinion gave him the final strength throughout his long and disabling illness. His strength of spirit as he fought his last battle stands as an inspiration to all. He was a man who was not defeated by life and could not be defeated by death.

New Yorkers mourn the loss of a fine man. Oppressed people everywhere will mourn the loss of a champion.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, on March 7, 1986, America lost a great statesman and citizen, Senator Jacob K. Javits. As is evident from the flood of tributes from all levels of American life, Senator Javits was an exemplary public servant who earned the respect and admiration of his colleagues in the House and Senate, Presidents, foreign leaders, and the American public.

Such admiration was well deserved. Jacob Javits served four terms in the U.S. Senate and worked tirelessly in drafting and helping to enact legislation on foreign affairs, urban redevelopment, civil rights, organized labor, and big business. As a liberal Republican, Senator Javits was a minority within a minority during his years in Washington. He was, however, regarded by Democrats and Republicans alike as one of the most intelligent, hard working, and effective Members of the Senate during his years there.

Mr. Speaker, Senator Javits devoted much of his time in the Senate to engineering the passage of three major pieces of legislation, each of which has improved the quality of life for many Americans in a cultural, economic, and global sense. He was a strong advocate of the ERISA Act, legislation that provides pensions for millions of Americans employed in private industry who were not covered by an adequate retirement plan and who had little more than Social Security benefits to look forward to once they had retired.

He ardently supported the War Powers Act, which limits the ability of a President to make war without congressional approval; he also advocated the formulation of the National Endowment for the Arts and the Humanities, which provides Government support for cultural projects.

Mr. Speaker, Senator Javits reached great political heights despite modest beginnings. The son of immigrant parents, Jacob Javits grew up on the Lower East Side of New York City, and like many other first-generation Americans, worked his way through school. He sold printing supplies as he took night courses at Columbia University, and graduated from New York University Law School in 1926. He became politically active soon thereafter and won his first election to Congress in 1946.

Despite his subsequent political successes, however, Senator Javits never forgot his beginnings. In 1973, he wrote in the New York Times:

> When I grew up on New York's Lower East Side, the furthest thing from my mind was any idea that I would spend more than half of my working years as a public servant. There were too many other things to pay attention to, like helping my janitor father put food on the table and keep the roof over our heads.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of serving in Congress as a contemporary of Senator Javits. He impressed me as a staunch advocate of civil and constitutional rights at a time when black Americans were being denied those fundamental rights. It was largely due to his strong leadership in the U.S. Senate that civil rights laws were enacted, ending official segregation and discrimination in this land.

Senator Javits record in the Senate is replete with gains made by minorities through his initiative and leadership. True to liberal causes, he never veered away from his purpose of working toward social reform, in order to obtain equality and justice for all Americans. Jacob Javits shall always be remembered as one of the greatest legislators in American history and his presence shall be sorely missed.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to honor Jacob Javits, a credit to the State of New York, a credit to his Nation.

It would be difficult to say more than has already has been said about Jack Javits. His funeral last week in New York, attended by the very best public servants this Nation has to offer, was in itself a tribute to the respect he won from his friends and colleagues from all points on the political spectrum.

Yet, I feel that I must in my own way say goodbye to Jack. It was his work, his efforts on behalf of all Americans, no matter their ethnic or racial heritage, that enabled individuals such as me to have the opportunity to take office and serve our Nation. The original Voting Rights Act and most civil rights legislation is the result of the work of men like Jack Javits. A generation is grateful to him and what he stood for.

I was perhaps most moved by a description in the New York Times of the memorial service that he asked to be read at his funeral. Apparently it read, in part, that "the living are like Moses who beholds the Promised Land and cannot enter." Jack Javits has entered the Promised Land. His long and bountiful journey is ended. And we, like Moses can only behold, but we are much the richer for having had Jacob Javits among us—if only for a while.

Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Jacob Javits gives us pause to reflect on the life and times of a man who left a lasting imprint on a nation and a people. Jacob Javits spent his life serving the American people during a period of social change and international crisis. He guided America through years of profound change in our history, from the McCarthy era, through Vietnam, and later Watergate, years that witnessed profound change in American society. His leadership transcended partisanship, his commitment to principle united the Nation, his vision inspired people a world away.

It is sadly ironic that Jacob Javits was defeated for reelection to the Senate just as his party was becoming the majority party. He would have chaired the Foreign Relations Committee, his lifelong ambition. Although he never assumed the charimanship of the Foreign Relations Committee, his commitment to a bipartisan foreign policy is a legacy that will continue to guide the committee and the development of that policy. His commitment to budgetary fairness and social conscience will continue to guide the Congress in its effort to reduce spending while not abandoning the principles of equity and compassion. This is the legacy Jacob Javits has left to the Nation he loved, a nation he made more vital and strong.

The last time I met with Senator Javits was during the markup on the tax bill. He came to see me on an issue of importance to his beloved New York as well as my State of Hawaii: deductibility of State and local taxes. Despite his illness, he was a forceful and effective advocate for his cause. One could not help but be moved by his courage in the face of adversity. As Senator MOYNIHAN said at the funeral service in New York, quoting the eloquent poem of Dylan Thomas, "Senator Javits did not go gentle into that good night. Jacob Javits fulfilled the highest tenets of his faith: He chose life."

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank my good friends and colleagues from New York, Mr. STRATTON and Mr. HORTON, for calling this special order today to pay tribute to one of America's finest statesmen, the late Senator Jacob Javits.

The son of poor immigrant parents, Jack Javits grew up in Manhattan's Lower East Side, which he once compared to living in a log cabin during President Lincoln's time. Through much hard work and diligence, he worked his way through Columbia University and later earned a law degree from New York University.

Throughout his many years in politics and government—during four terms in the House, as New York State's attorney general, and during his long and distinguished career in the U.S. Senate—Jack Javits never forgot his roots and remained one of New York State's and New York City's staunchest supporters. He has been recognized by critics and admirers alike as intelligent, industrious, and certainly one of our Nation's most effective and influential legislators.

He was the first to admit that the Senate was his greatest love. He knew its ways intimately, and appreciated the strengths and foibles of each Member. Senator Javits served as ranking minority member on the Senate Foreign Relations, and Labor and Human Relations Committees, and he used his powerful positions to promote some of the most significant legislative initiatives of the past 20 years.

Jack Javits took an especially active role in shaping important labor legislation such as workers' compensation, occupational safety and health, child labor laws, minimum wage laws, and job opportunity programs for youth and minorities.

When asked what he considered to be his most significant accomplishments, Senator Javits cited these three legislative initiatives: the Pension Reform Act of 1974 which regulates private pension plans for an estimated 30 million workers; the War Powers Act, the law which sets limits on Presidential powers to authorize military activities without congressional consent; and finally, the establishment of the National Endowment for the Arts and Humanities to promote cultural and artistic efforts. Based on this alone, he could be acclaimed one of the most effective leaders in Congress—Republican or Democrat—of his time.

Stricken with Lou Gehrig's disease, a debilitating neuromotor disorder, Jack fought a courageous battle to keep active and working. He was confined to a wheelchair, but he continued to speak and write and testify before congfressional committees. Jack Javits felt a strong responsibility to repay the society which gave a poor immigrant's son the opportunity to serve in the U.S. Senate.

He was a man of principle, loyalty, and fairness. We will miss him, and I offer my deepest sympathy to his family. It was an honor to serve with him in New York State's congressional delegation. He will be long remembered and respected as one of our country's finest statesmen, for he has left behind him an enduring legacy of legislation benefiting all Americans.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I mark the passing of Senator Jacob Javits. The legacy he has left us as a model of statesmanship will long be remembered. His compassion and fairness in legislation and his great respect for the Senate serves to infuse us all with the incentive to honor public trust.

The State of New York was truly fortunate to be represented in the Senate by the man of courage and fortitude. During his 24 years in public service, Senator Javits was a pacesetter in civil rights, labor, and foreign affairs legislation. His bills assured private pensions for millions of American workers; he provided jobs for the unemployed and heat for the elderly.

As the son of an immigrant who grew up in a tenement on the Lower East Side of New York City, Jack Javits rose from his humble beginnings to become one of the most effective and influential Senators in the history of our country. He accomplished this great feat through hard work and belief in the goodness of man. Even from his position of power, he never betrayed the trust of the working-class men and women he represented. He was an exemplar to the greatest degree of the American work ethic.

Many dignitaries, Republicans and Democrats alike, attended Senator Javits' funeral service on Monday, March 10, 1986. The presence of these distinguished citizens, who came to eulogize Senator Javits, serves as a testament to his vision and leadership. His principles attracted diverse philosophies and crossed all party boundaries.

Although I never had the chance to work in the Congress with Senator Javits, I considered it a privilege to have been a constituent of a Senator who served the people of New York. He will be sorely missed, but his initiatives will continue to keep his ideals in the forefront of American politics. My sympathies go out to the Javits family, especially to his wife, Marion.

Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleagues in a tribute to the late Senator Jacob K. Javits, whose remarkable career clearly illustrates the true meaning of public service.

During his 24-year tenure in the U.S. Senate, Jacob Javits worked diligently and relentlessly to improve the quality of life for his New York constituency, as well as his fellow Americans. As a member of a poor immigrant family, he experienced on a first-hand basis the extreme adversities facing minorities in our country. As part of a political minority in the Senate, he became a strong voice advocating the advancement of civil rights, the guarantee of private pensions, public assistance for the arts and humanities, and the limitation of the President's ability to make war through the War Powers Act. On an international scale, Senator Javits actively supported the formulation and implementation of the Middle East peace accords, and encouraged the broadening of U.S. relations with the Communist countries, particularly China.

Even after leaving the Senate in 1980 and being crippled by Lou Gerhig's disease, Senator Javits continued to write and speak publicly, sharing his vast knowledge and experience. Senator Javits' great courage and willingness to fight against the odds, in the name of public welfare, will certainly serve as an inspiration to all Americans for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a March 10 editorial from the Buffalo News, in my district in western New York, which eloquently summarizes the substantive contribution Senator Jacob Javits made to our country.

JACOB JAVITS

America, the land of opportunity, has lost a distinguished citizen with the passing of Jacob K. Javits, who used that opportunity to work for the betterment of his state and nation.

Born in a tenement on New York's lower East Side, the son of poor immigrant parents, Javits rose to become one of the most highly regarded members of the U.S. Senate. And his 24 years in the chamber left a rich legacy of beneficial legislation.

For most of his congressional service, he was in the political minority, but such were his talent and energy that he played major roles in writing landmark bills into law. He was proudest of his work on legislation to advance civil rights, limit a president's war-making power, safeguard private pensions and endow the arts and humanities.

He was a strong force for liberalism within the Republican Party, and that fact, together with his age and failing health, contributed to his election defeat in the conservative tide of 1980. Nothing could detract, however, from the excellence of his legislative service. His intelligence, zest for work and concern for the public welfare won the admiration of colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

For all his accomplishments in government, however, it may be that his greatest contribution, as Gov. Cuomo suggested, was simply "his demonstration of courage in refusing to surrender to his illness," the paralyzing disease that forced him to spend his last years in a wheelchair, using a respirator.

Despite his terminal affliction, Javits continued to write, travel and make speeches, and to cherish what he called "the excitement and expectation of living the days you're given to live."

Javits was justly ranked among the nation's great senators. He set a standard of faithful and responsible public service that deserves to be long remembered.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to the late Senator Jacob Javits, Republican of New York. After having bravely fought a courageous battle against disease, Senator Javits died last week at the age of 81. He left behind him a record of public service and commitment unmatched by most, including 8 years in the House of Representatives and 24 years in the U.S. Senate. He will be missed by all who knew and worked with him.

I was a constituent of Jacob Javits' for 13 years until I moved to Florida. I remember Senator Javits as a man dedicated to helping the people of New York. He worked tirelessly to protect the interests of every man and woman—the poor, the oppressed, the handicapped, and the elderly. And he fought relentlessly to make a better life for the Italians, Hispanics, Irish, Chinese, Jews, and every other immigrant who came to live in America.

I also remember Senator Javits as an indefatigable worker not only on behalf of the State of Israel, but also on behalf of issues and concerns that touched all aspects of Jewish communal life. He worked upfront and backstage for the Jewish state and was looked upon by other Senators and politicians for guidance and advice on issues affecting Israel.

As a liberal Republican, he commanded respect from both sides of the aisle. He was a brilliant legislator and distinguished leader, playing a role in almost every piece of foreign policy legislation of the postwar era. He was involved in drafting the War Powers Resolution of 1973 and helped win its passage over President Nixon's veto.

But most of all, Jacob Javits was a man of the Senate. He defined the title of U.S. Senator and was an inspiration to those who carry on in his footsteps. We honor this man's longstanding commitment to public service, his wisdom, his compassion, and in the end, his great personal courage.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, when you think of New York, you think of Jacob Javits—the two were synonymous.

The son of immigrants, Jacob Koppel Javits rose from humble beginnings in a tenement on New York's Lower East Side to an outstanding career in public service.

For 24 years, Jack Javits served in the U.S. Senate, longer than any other New York Senator. Prior to reaching that pinnacle, Javits served 8 years in the House of Representatives and for 2 years was attorney general of New York State.

Senator Javits never forgot his State or its citizens. I knew him well, serving in the House during his Senate tenure, and I can attest that he was always available to discuss an issue or problem affecting New York. More often than not, he found a way to solve the problem.

As recently as last December, Jack Javits still was hard at work for his State, lobbying Members of Congress on tax reform issues of concern to New York.

But Jacob Javits was much more than a parochial Senator; he was a hard working and courageous statesman who had a hand in virtually every major piece of legislation that passed the Senate during his quarter century in that body.

Although he was a member of the Senate's minority party during all but the last 4 years of his career, Javits was a guiding force behind major pieces of legislation dealing with issues such as civil rights, social welfare, arts and humanities, pension reform, foreign affairs, and gun control. One of his most outstanding achievements was passage of the War Powers Act, a law now considered to be one of the most important pieces of legislation considered during this century.

Never forgetting his family experience and early years of poverty, Jack Javits always maintained a deep concern for the poor and oppressed. That concern culminated with passage of his bill creating the Legal Services Corporation.

Javits devoted his life to the U.S. Senate. He once said he loved the institution like a wife. But for all his feelings about the Senate and all his respect for and knowledge about the Senate, Jack Javits was always an outsider in that body. As a liberal Republican he didn't fit into the mold required to be a member of the inner circle but nonetheless he earned the respect of his colleagues as one of the Senate's greatest minds and surely he will be remembered as a Senate giant.

Throughout his Senate career, Jacob Javits was a staunch supporter of Israel, defending United States military assistance to the Jewish state as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. In 1977, he helped shape the Israeli-Egyptian peace proposal that ended in the Camp David accord.

His dream was to become chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but his reelection defeat in 1980 robbed him of the opportunity. However, following that defeat, his Senate colleagues afforded him the honor of serving as chairman for 1 day when Democratic Chairman Frank Church stepped down a day early. It was a well-deserved honor for a man who had given so much of himself to the Senate and his country.

Even after Lou Gehrig's disease took its toll on his body, Jack Javits' mind remained as alert as ever, and he refused to let the debilitating illness hold him back. Confined to a wheelchair and attached to a respirator, Javits continued to testify before Congress, counsel his colleagues, and speak to interested audiences, even when his voice was no more than a whisper.

Jacob K. Javits has earned his place in history through his hard work and courage. The citizens of New York and all Americans owe him a debt of gratitude.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I join my colleagues today in this special order to mark the passing of Jacob Javits and to honor this distinguished man. Born in a tenement in New York City's Lower East Side in 1904, Mr. Javits worked his way through Columbia University and the New York University School of Law graduating in 1926. He practiced law until the start of World War II when his efforts to enlist in the Army were rebuffed because of his age. He then volunteered to work as a civilian for the Army as was later commissioned as an officer in 1942. He helped to plan the invasions of Europe and Japan and was a lieutenant colonel when he left the service in 1945.

Mr. Javits was elected to the House of Representatives in 1946 and served 8 years before being elected attorney general for the State of New York. In 1956, he was elected to the U.S. Senate where he served with distinction for 24 years. As a leading representative of the liberal wing of the Republican Party, Senator Javits was a principal author of the War Powers Act of 1973. He was also a strong advocate of the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities and an effective proponent of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Senator Javits will be missed by all of us who knew him. He was a serious and hard-working man who never allowed political expediency to come before what he considered the best interests of the people of our Nation. Mr. Javits was born in humble circumstances and steadily rose to prominence in the service of his country. His impressive ascendence represents what is possible in this land of opportunity. Senator Javits never forgot his background and he spent much of his political life seeking to ensure that all Americans would have the opportunity to succeed. Even in death, Jacob Javits will live as an example to future generations of Americans. This is as it should be.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the New York congressional delegation for sponsoring this special order to honor Senator Jacob Javits, whose passing we now mourn, but whose life we celebrate.

Jacob Koppel Javits was born in a Lower East Side, Manhattan tenement on May 18, 1904. Born to immigrant parents, Jack Javits started out his life in the New York City of the 1900's like so many others who later attained greatness; concerned only with assisting his parents in maintaining the household, and putting bread on the family table. He worked in a New Jersey factory while attending Columbia University at night, and later graduated from New York University Law School. His introduction to politics occurred in 1932, when he joined the political club of Fiorello H. La Guardia. In 1946, he was the Manhattan Republican Party's candidate for an Upper West Side congressional seat which had, for the previous 23 years, never been occupied by a Republican. He won that race, and remained in the House until 1954 when, again defying the conventional political wisdom of the day, ran for State attorney general against Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. Victorious again, Jack Javits established himself as a Republican force to be reckoned with in New York State politics. Two years later, in 1956, Jack Javits gained his party's nomination to run for the Senate against another well-known Democrat, New York Mayor Robert F. Wagner. Once again, Jack Javits came out on top, and continued to represent the citizens of New York in the U.S. Senate until 1980.

Mr. Speaker, as a 34-year Member of the Congress of the United States, I have had the distinct honor and privilege to work with some of the greatest individuals to ever serve the Nation, be it in the executive, judicial, or legislative branches of Government. I would certainly count Jack Javits in that number. During his tenure as U.S. Senator, and during the years that followed his service in Congress—years that saw him struggle against a debilitating disease that wracked his body, but not his mind—Jack Javits displayed an inspirational courage and greatness that few others could hope to attain or demonstrate. His continued struggles in Congress were on behalf of civil rights, urban redevelopment, and housing for the poor. During his later years in the Senate, Jack turned his considerable energies toward U.S. foreign policy. He was instrumental in the formulation and passage of the War Powers Act, and was a vigorous proponent of the State of Israel. Jack Javits was one of the most respected and influential political figures in the Nation during his service in the Congress.

Jack Javits showed all of us how to live a life of self sacrifice and commitment. The example he left at the close of his time on this Earth was equally important. Someone once said that "life shrinks or expands in proportion to one's courage." Perhaps the greatest contribution that Jack Javits made was the demonstration of that courage that he provided for all of us. His life continued to grow during its closing years. We were the beneficiaries of his public service and, with the example he set, we will be the beneficiaries of his public passing.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join my colleagues in honoring a great American, the late Senator Jacob Javits of New York.

As chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I would like the record to show that Senator Javits began his long and distinguished period of congressional service as a member of our committee. Subsequently, as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he worked closely with many of our members in drafting legislation of historic importance. One such measure, of course, was the War Powers Act in which I was directly involved, together with the late Clem Zablocki and other committee members. It is not an exaggeration to say that without the leadership of Jake Javits, this landmark bill would not have been passed in the Senate over a Presidential veto.

Senator Javits' interests ranged across the full spectrum of foreign policy issues. He was very knowledgeable and very quick to grasp the crux of the most complex issue. He was known for doing his homework. He was a passionate supporter of Israel, but at the same time, a sophisticated and knowledgeable observer of the entire Middle Eastern political scene.

I believe his interest in Latin America, which lasted throughout his public career, began during the 80th Congress when he served on the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee which I subsequently chaired. Senator Javits was particularly interested in efforts to bring United States business and private enterprise into the Latin American development process.

This is just an abbreviated sampling of the Senator's many causes and legislative initiatives to which he devoted his time, his talents and his varied resources. He fought long, and effectively, for what he believed in and his last battle against the dread Lou Gehrig's disease was, to my mind, especially reflective of his indomitable spirit.

Senator Javits was universally admired for his intellect; for his sense of justice and humanity, as well as civil rights; and for his devotion to the people of his State. However, his greatest accomplishment, to my mind, was his ability to bring respectability and, indeed, honor to the political profession—and for that, my colleagues, we owe him a large debt of gratitude.

Mr. Speaker, to the family and many friends and admirers of Jacob Javits, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in the House of Representatives in paying tribute to Senator Jacob Javits, who died on March 7, after a long and distinguished career in public service.

I had the privilege of serving with Senator Javits as a member of the congressional delegation to NATO, and I came to know and respect this commanding knowledge and expertise in international relations. His death is a tremendous loss to the people of the State of New York and to all citizens of this Nation.

Senator Javits graduated from New York University Law School in 1926, and served four terms as a Member of the House of Representatives from 1947 to 1953. He served as attorney general for the State of New York from 1954 to 1955, and was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1956, where he conscientiously served the people of New York for four consecutive terms.

During the 24 years Senator Javits served in the U.S. Senate, he compiled an outstanding record of achievement, and was highly respected by his colleagues for his knowledge, honesty, and integrity, and for his legislative abilities. He was instrumental in writing the War Powers Act, as well as the creation of ERISA to provide pensions for the millions of Americans not covered by adequate retirement plans, and the creation of the National Endowment for the Arts and the Humanities.

Senator Javits was a dedicated and devoted American, and a Senator of great ability, deep compassion, and courage, who dedicated his life to public service, representing the people of New York for almost one-quarter of a century.

Mr. Speaker, Senator Javits will truly be missed by all those who knew him as well as those who knew of his numerous contributions to the greatness of America. Mrs. Annunizo and I extend our deepest sympathy to the members of his family who survive him.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE STRAIGHT ROAD TO DEFICIT REDUCTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the President's budget submitted to the Congress within the past 30 days contains projections on gross Federal debt that prompted this Member from California to take this special evening to talk about. Specifically, the President's budget observes that at the end of the next fiscal year, 1987, the gross Federal debt will be $2,321,000,000,000 and then by 1991, the gross Federal debt will be some $2,977,000,000,000, close to $3 trillion.

It took this Nation from 1789 to 1980 to get to the trillion-dollar debt level. It took us about 5 years after that to get an additional trillion dollars of debt. And if things continue as the President's budget indicates, by 1991, we will reach almost a $3 trillion debt level.

There are certain economic assumptions, of course, that go into the estimation of debt as was just indicated, and I will address those shortly. I think it is appropriate for the House and the Congress and the Nation to engage in a national debate on what benefit comes to all of us, homeowners, business people, college students, and the Federal Government itself by addressing the third item in the budget; namely, interest on the national debt. The interest on the national debt that will be estimated to be paid in this fiscal year, 1986, is some $196 billion. That interest expense in 1987 is estimated to go to $207 billion. That is about 20 percent of the total budgetary spending.

This Congress passed in the closing days of 1985 a landmark piece of legislation called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and it requires that certain reductions take place across the board. In fiscal year 1987, it is estimated that the total deficit may not exceed $144 billion; in 1988, $108 billion; and in 1989, $72 billion. That is the deficit reduction goal.

If we do not change from the course we are now pursuing, the deficits in those years will be close to $200 billion each. If we adopt a change in the base for our monetary system from what it is today, backed by nothing, and back the currency of this Nation with gold, we would be able to reduce the annual interest expense on the national debt from the projected amount of some $207 billion in fiscal year 1987 down to a significantly lower figure estimated in 1987 to be $91.3 billion. That is the net interest cost expense, and this would reduce the deficit in 1987 to $127.1 billion; in 1988 to $49.1 billion; and in 1989 to $40.2 billion.

This deficit reduction is accomplished through the adoption of the Gold Standard Act of 1986, H.R. 4401, which will reduce interest rates from their current high of almost an average expense of 10 percent on the outstanding national debt of $2 trillion down to about 2½ percent.

□ 2050

The benefit from this reduction of interest cost expense is that it avoids the politically undesirable and traumatic act for all of us in Congress to explain to our constituents how we are going to vote to reduce what any beneficiary of an existing Federal program receives, or what the various activities of the Federal Government now propose to spend.

I guess you could say that the political pain for all of us in reducing interest on the national debt is a lot less from the standpoint of the negative impact on Members of Congress and the political pain that will be realized by telling the various beneficiaries of Federal spending programs that they are to receive less money for energy programs or transportation programs or UDAG grants, or what have you.

The budget reduction that I am talking about in terms of reducing the interest cost expense would permit the President's program for defense to increase by 3 percent after inflation; it would permit all spending programs currently in place to continue as is projected by the CBO baseline; it would permit this to take place without increasing taxes from what is projected under the existing tax system; and it will result in a deficit reduction level to $40 billion in fiscal year 1989.

These benefits come from reducing the interest cost on the national debt. This Member from California in 1985 and 1984 has offered budget plans to the House for its consideration which would identify specific program cuts in 1985. Last year this Member offered a plan that would have reduced the projected deficit by some $62 billion, by reducing the spending for about 77 specified social programs of some $28 billion. By reducing the projected outlay in defense by some $18 billion and by establishing a freeze which would reduce projected spending by some $12 billion and then interest cost reductions by not borrowing that quantity of money, raise the total projected reductions to $62 billion.

Less than the required 218 votes were achieved for that program, and the rationale is quite simple: Members of Congress are reluctant to be identified with their vote of record whereby a beneficiary of a Federal spending program is going to get less, because the perception is that in the next election campaign, their opponent will point out to their constituents that the rascal who wants to give them less should be thrown out and the opponent says, "Put me in office and I'll keep the money faucets going."

This is a very real consideration, and I appreciate that concern, that many Members of this House have. We just collectively do not have the courage to reduce spending so as to match the outgo with the income unless we focus on those items in the budget that politically and practically and pragmatically deserve our attention; namely, interest expenditure on the national debt.

When you compare the quantity of money that we are spending of interest on the national debt, $193 billion out of $209 billion deficit, in this fiscal year that is 93 percent. In other words, of the existing deficit for 1986, 93 percent of it goes for interest cost expenses.

In my opening remarks, I reported that the President's budget for fiscal year 1987 contains some debt projections that are truly staggering and awesome to contemplate. When you look at the changes in the Federal debt for 1987, we find it is rising by $209 billion. In 1988, by $188 billion; in 1989, by $175 billion; 1990 by $157 billion, and 1991 by $136 billion.

These projections assume that certain reductions will take place in interest rates that frankly you could almost say are part of a rosy scenario, because it assumes that interest rates will be declining as follows: In 1987, on the interest rate it builds up to 1 year, 6.5 percent, and by 1991 that that interest rate would be reduced under the existing regime or monetary base of 4 percent. In 1987, notes of 1 to 10 years, the interest rate is projected at 8.6 percent. In 1991, that is projected to decrease to 4½ percent.

When you use the figures in the President's budget as a baseline, you can calculate that the projected total interest on the gross Federal debt will be as follows: In 1986, it will be $196 billion. In 1987, $207 billion; and in the years 1988 through 1991, a total of $211 billion constant interest cost expense in each of those fiscal years.

The bill that I have introduced, H.R. 4401, provides for resumption of the gold standard, and calls for the conversion of the public debt into long term debt financed at 2¼ or 2½ percent. This measure would slash the total interest on the gross Federal debt to one quarter of what it would be under the President's budget, as we can see as follows:

In 1987, if we follow the President's budget projections, the interest cost will be a gross of $207 million; under H.R. 4401, the gold standard bill that I have introduced, the interest cost in 1987 would be $130 billion, a savings or a reduction of $77 billion; and in 1988 the interest on the national debt would be $56 billion from the projected $211 billion, or a savings of $155 billion.

What I am suggesting is that by issuing bonds backed by gold as a step to the gold standard for this country, the interest savings in 1987 would be $77 billion and in 1988, $155 billion.

This bill, H.R. 4401, would turn the deficit into surplus no later than 1991. We may therefore conclude that the straight road to deficit reduction is not via cutting domestic and defense programs, nor by increasing taxes, but through cutting the interest cost on the gross Federal debt. This cut is available immediately upon resumption.

The cost of debt service is defined as total interest on the gross Federal debt plus payments on principal, if any. No payments on principal have been made since 1969, and the President's 1987 budget does not envision any net reduction in the gross Federal debt for the years 1987 and 1991 and beyond.

Not only do we borrow money to meet the maturing debt, but we also borrow money to meet the interest payments as they fall due. This state of financial affairs is not a healthy one; and its continuation is liable to undermine the credit of the Federal Government.

No individual, no corporation or for that matter, no other sovereign state could carry on and stay in business with the understanding that its entire debt service depended upon the availability of new credits for as long as one could see into the future.

Public awareness of the problem is hampered by faulty assumptions and self-serving definitions. One such faulty assumption is that the Government can, by virtue of its taxing powers, push its credit limits over the rainbow.

If that assumption were true, there would be no United States of America. We must not forget that the independence of this Nation was first conceived as a revolt against oppressive taxation.

An example of a self-serving definition is a concept of net interest on the public debt, which is the centerpiece of OMB projections, pretending that it represents the cost of debt service faithfully.

Net interest is defined as total interest less the interest payable to Government trust fund accounts. The argument in favor of using net interest as a gauge of the debt burden is that interest payable to the trust fund accounts shows up in the budget both as a revenue and as an outlay, so that its net effect on the budget is nil.

The Government, as it were, takes money out of one pocket and puts it into another. But unless the Government can discover a way to spend the same sum of money twice, the interest charge in the trust fund accounts against general revenues is real and should show up in the cost of debt service. Indeed, this cost is reflected in the gross Federal debt.

In extrapolating the cost of debt service for the years 1987 to 1991, the most important parameter is the rate of interest. If short term rates were to increase by 1 percent, this could add $15 billion to the cost of debt service each year.

If short term interest rates were to hit their former peak of 15 percent, this could mean a difference of $150 billion every year. The President's budget makes rosy assumptions about the future course of interest rates spelled out.

Since interest rates have been declining for 4 years in a row, the assumption that they will keep declining further throughout the period 1986 and 1991 without interruptions or reversals appears overly optimistic.

It is akin to the gambler's optimism who, having hit the jackpot twice in succession, takes it for granted that he will hit it again the third time around. The next table [table not reproduced in the RECORD] shows the total interest, calculated on the basis of the assumptions in the President's budget. But because these are optimistic assumptions, we must note that the total interest costs shown are minimum figures, that is, upward revision may be necessary later on, and these revisions may well be in the order of $100 billion per annum—or a deviation of 50 percent from the figures shown.

In 1986 at the start of the fiscal year the gross Federal debt is $1.828 trillion and the change in gross Federal debt over the preceding year is $284 billion and total interest expenses of $196 billion. In 1991 under the President's proposal the start of the fiscal year the debt will be $2.841 billion, a change in gross Federal debt of $135 billion with total interest expense of $211 billion. Thus even the most optimistic assumptions in the President's budget cannot produce a reduction in the total interest. At best, we can hope for the total interest cost on the GFD to level off.

One of the most startling facts to be observed in this whole discussion of the cost of servicing the national debt is to see a graph indicating the quantity of money percentagewise that we are paying for maintaining the national debt in terms of general undesignated tax revenue. In order to put the cost of debt service in perspective it has been calculated that the ratio of total interest to general tax revenues, that is to say the cost of debt service for each tax dollar collected for the past 10 years, in 1977 general tax revenues amounted to $229 billion, the total interest expense of $43 billion; that calculates out to 18½ cents of every general fund undesignated dollar being expended for interest. In 1986 general tax revenues are estimated at $457 billion and the total interest expense is $196 billion, or 43 cents of every dollar of undesignated general fund revenues servicing interest on the national debt. The cost of debt service has been increasing by leaps and bounds, at last count taking a bite of 43 cents of each tax dollar collected by the Government. From CBO projections [not reproduced in the RECORD] we have calculated that this ratio is going to reach 48 cents by 1990. This means that almost one-half of the general tax revenues is going to be spent, not by the Government, but by the creditors of the Government. In other words, neither the legislative nor the executive branch of the Government controls the way in which one-half of its tax collection is being spent. The Government imposes and collects the taxes, but loses control over the spending of half of it. The Government is, for all intents and purposes, reduced to a collection agency, taking money away from the dynamic producers of wealth—who have to bear all the risks—and handing it over to the coupon-clipping class—who bear no risks.

But it should be clear that there is a limit to the ability of the Government to transfer wealth on such a huge scale. The idea of a representative government such as ours is that the public purse is in the hands of elected representatives who can be recalled by the taxpayers if the public purse is mismanaged. But when half of the Government's revenues are spent by the creditors of the Government who are not accountable to the electorate, the idea of representative government is lost. To continue on that path would be tantamount to courting disaster, either in the form of a debt collapse, or in the form of a tax revolt.

When Louis XIV—Louis le Grand—died in 1715, after a reign of 72 years, he left France with a public debt of some 3 billion livres, the interest on which—about 86 million livres—took a bite which was more than half of the state revenues, about 165 million livres. The debt had increased twenty-fold in less than 30 years. The coinage had been debased by half. To solve the fiscal crisis the Regent called upon the services of a Scots adventurer, John Law of Lariston, who had made a sensation by publishing a monetary treatise entitled "Supplying the Nation with Money." In anticipating a curious mixture of Keynesian and Friedmanite economics, John Law maintained that "wealth depends on the Circulation," and circulation can safely be expanded as long as the total stays within the bounds set by the value of the land. The Regent became obsessed with the idea of such an easy solution to the budget deficit and recommended the establishment of a bank of issue. This institution, the Banque Generale, under the management of John Law himself, was an instant success. Public despair turned into confidence, confidence into euphoria, and euphoria into mania. John Law's bank didn't just bankroll the government, it also financed the Mississippi bubble which, when it burst, wiped out the entire public debt—by making it worthless.

Today the Federal Reserve System has the same powers as the Banque Generale did under John Law's management. The danger is that the Federal Reserve Board, which, like the Bourbons "learns nothing and forgets nothing," is about to repeat history.

THE REAL CAUSE OF BUDGET DEFICITS

It appears that the Gramm-Rudman approach, in cutting spending here and raising taxes there, is trying to cure hemorrhage by applying more Band-Aids. But the time has now come for a remedy that reaches beyond the symptoms, and treats the real cause of the ailment.

As every analysis of the budget deficit points out, the cost of debt service has been the fastest growing component of outlays, even though not one dollar of debt has been retired during the past 17 years on a net basis. This state of affairs won't change, no matter how much domestic and defense spendings are cut. You can't cure lung cancer by removing the liver.

The cost of debt service has increased rapidly because interest rates became volatile after the dollar was set afloat in the early 1970's. There is no compelling reason to expect that cutting domestic and defense spending will result in lower interest rates, let alone less volatile interest rates. The only way to lower interest rates and to make them less volatile is to remove the cause of high volatility: the floating dollar. That is to say, the dollar must be stabilized.

If the dollar were, once more, defined by statute as a fixed weight of gold, as prescribed by the Constitution, then the rate of interest would, once again, become low and stable, and the entire public debt, $2 trillion all told, could be refinanced as long term debt at 2½ percent. Not only would this cut the deficit by more than three-quarters but, above all, it would remove the greatest source of uncertainty from the budget. All deficit projections, including those for the next fiscal year, are subject to error in the order of $100 billion, due to the single cause of interest rate hikes.

Once the dollar is stabilized, we could stop worrying about deficit reduction, and start working for debt reduction.

There is a painless, not to say pleasurable, way of turning deficits into surpluses, without cutting domestic or defense spending, and without increasing taxes. The cost of borrowing could be cut to about one-quarter of what it is today, if the Treasury were to issue gold bonds, as stipulated in H.R. 4401.

This process is shown by the following evidence.

In 1987 we could reduce the projected cost of interest at $207 billion to $130 billion, a reduction of $77 billion, and by 1991 and for all of the years between 1988 and 1991 the interest in the President's budget stipulated at $211 billion would be reduced to $57 billion for a reduction or savings of $155 billion in each of those years.

The cumulative saving in interest over the whole period 1987 to 1991 would be almost $700 billion.

It is understandable that the President is reluctant to accept tax increases as a valid instrument of deficit reduction. Both logic and experience indicate that tax increases trigger higher budget deficits through the mechanism of disincentives. Taxpayers react to ever higher taxes by reducing productive effort, because all they see is ever higher taxes at the end of the high-tax-tunnel. The gold standard, on the other hand, is free from this mechanism of disincentives. As this study shows, the gold standard gives the country not just deficit reduction but also debt reduction. The taxpayers see the light of lower taxes at the end of the high-tax-tunnel.

The transition from floating to the stable dollar will take place during fiscal year 1987. In the space of one year, the Treasury will refinance virtually the entire debt in the form of long term gold bonds—Eagle bonds—with a coupon rate at 2½ percent. As the Treasury acquires the gold in exchange for the Eagle bonds, it will deposit gold certificates in the Federal Reserve banks in exchange for Federal Reserve deposits. The Treasury balances will be calculated at the verifiable gold price, subject to adjustment on R-day when the statutory gold price is proclaimed. These Treasury balances are used to retire the old dollar debt and also to pay for current Government expenditures.

The Federal Reservce banks must be permanently barred from acquiring Eagle bonds or any other Government securities. They will gradually build up their portfolio of earning assets during fiscal year 1987 consisting of eligible commercial paper as defined by the Federal Reserve Act of 1913.

The results of resumption would be even more dramatic and salutary than the figures in this study suggest. Industry and agriculture would go through a great uplifting experience as they shook off the yoke of usurious interest rates. We would witness an enthusiastic return to equity financing from the unhealthy debt financing of recent decades, because under the regime of stable currency there would be no incentives attached to the latter. Productivity would be multiplied and economic activity would be revitalized across the board in direct response to lower interest rates. New capital would be generated as the gold standard created new incentives to channel savings away from the zero-sum game of short term speculation, into the positive-sum game of long term capital markets. All this would generate an open-ended demand for labor to man new plants and equipment.

While this country would still have many unsolved problems, efforts to solve them would no longer be sabotaged by an unstable and depreciating currency.

Contrary to propaganda, the gold standard can accommodate the generous social policies already in place in this country, and it is fully compatible with our program of maintaining this Nation's defence at an adequate level. Once adopted, the gold standard works toward debt-reduction and hence tax cuts, in direct contrast with the irredeemable dollar standard, which can only generate growing debt and tax hikes.

At the heart of the reform is the integrity of the monetary system, and the faith in promises and contracts. Just as dishonesty does not pay in the long run, so the floating dollar is also self-defeating.

One of the crucial questions asked as part of this proposal is why would a bondholder currently receiving 10 percent on an average for bonds issued by the U.S. Treasury convert their bonds into gold bonds despite the steep reduction in the rate of interest? In other words, if you are receiving a rate of interest of 10 percent on a bond the U.S. Government has issued, why would you in your right mind exchange such a bond for a bond paying 2¼ or 2½ percent interest, which is a very good question?

The monetary reform outlined in H.R. 4401 is based on the assumption that bondholders holding noncallable Government bonds bearing interest at say 10 percent would voluntarily exchange their bonds for gold bonds paying 2½ percent. This assumption I think calls for some justification.

When a corporation issuing convertible bonds wants their bondholders to make the conversion sooner rather than later it will prescribe a schedule of rising conversion value for its stocks where the steepness of the rise in the schedule of the conversion values will influence the length of the conversion period: the steeper the rise, the shorter the conversion period.

This well known principle of incentives is incorporated in the bill, H.R. 4401.

If the Eagle bonds are not selling sufficiently well on D-day, the Treasury will have to go into the cash market to buy gold in order to meet the maturing debt after R-day.

Treasury purchases of gold will cause the gold prices to show an up trend between D-day and R-day, and the Treasury is well able to control the steepness of the rise. Thus, the rising gold price furnishes the incentive mechanism corresponding the schedule of rising conversion of stocks, as in the example of convertible corporation bonds.

It is important to understand in this context that Treasury purchases of gold under the gold standard are costless. The money to pay for the gold is not appropriated by Congress. In fact, this is the only example of Government acquisition that has no budgetary consequences. The Treasury's account with the Federal Reserve Banks will not be depleted in consequence of the gold purchases since the Treasury deposits an equal amount of gold certificates.

This completes the analogy with the company issuing convertible bonds. The company can set up an arbitrary schedule of conversion values for its stock because the company creates those stocks at no cost to itself.

The question also arises whether it makes sense to talk about 2.5 percent interest with nobody, certainly no government, has succeeded within living memory to borrow at such low rights. The answer is that governments are prisoners of their own ideology.

Several finance houses have borrowed quite recently hundreds of millions of dollars at interest rates as low as 1 percent. The purpose of the loan in each case was the sinking of a new gold mine. The amount of monetary gold in private hands is estimated at 50,000 metric tons, or $570 billion when gold is valued at $350 per ounce. The owners of this gold are paying at the rate of one-quarter of 1 percent per annum in carrying charges for the privilege of holding monetary gold. If they exchange their gold for Eagle bonds, they would be earning a return of 2.5 percent, instead of losing one-quarter of 1 percent, for a net gain of 2¾ of 1 percent per annum, and they would end up as owners of the best paper in the world. This best paper, the gold bond issued by the United States of America, has been totally absent in the financial markets for over half a century. Its return should be received by the financial community with a tumultuous welcome.

There can be no question about the ultimate success of the Eagle bond program.

Another question that arises is: What is the composition of the debt held by the public, that is, by private investors today?

This chart illustrates that within 1 year $464 billion of the debt held in the hands of private investors will come due; in 1 to 5 years, $367 billion of the debt held by the public will come due; and in 5 to 10 years, $144 billion of the debt will come due. I want to emphasize this is just the debt held by private investors, not the entire outstanding U.S. debt of close to $2 trillion.

It is obvious that the vast majority of the debt held in private hands has a maturity of less than 5 years. In other words, when this debt becomes due, the U.S. Government can refinance this debt at the interest rate called for in an Eagle bond of 2¼ percent.

This chart illustrates the message of what percentage of our undesignated Federal revenue is being paid today, interest on the national debt. In 1977, it was 18½ cents; in 1986, the current fiscal year, it is 43 cents; and it is estimated to go to 48 cents by 1990 if we continue on our present course.

This Member from California hopes that during the course of the coming weeks when the Congress will be taking up the issue of a budget resolution, that as part of the debate in the process, we will have an opportunity of hearing more about what restoring honest money in this country will do for the Federal Government's ability to sell its debt at a rate of interest that permits us to comply with Gramm-Rudman, to comply with the President's request for an increase in defense spending by 3 percent after inflation, by permitting COLA's to rise per the CPI, and by not touching any of the projected spending as contained in the CBO projection for spending in fiscal year 1986. We do that by reducing interest expense on the national debt.

For any citizen in America who wonders what this means to them for restoring honest money and reducing interest rates, if you are looking for a home, how would you like to be able to acquire it at 5 to 6 percent interest? If you are a business man or woman, how would you like to be able to pay for the cost of borrowing money at 5 or 6 percentage points less than what the bank is now charging? If you are a college student in this country trying to finance your education, instead of paying 9 or 10 or 11 percent for that loan, how does 4, 5, or 6 percent interest rates sound to you?

This is what it means to all of us in the country of removing ourselves from this paper dollar backed by nothing, which we have been pursuing since 1971, lower interest rates for all of us, irrespective of our station in life.

IMPORTS POSE DANGER TO NATIONAL SECURITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, last week, Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige appeared before the Congressional Steel Caucus and, when asked about the impact of imports of key materials on our national defense, hemmed and hawed and, finally, indicated it was a confusing subject that was under study by the present administration.

What is particularly confusing and disconcerting about Secretary Baldrige's performance is that just last Tuesday, March 11, a report in the Washington Post indicated that Pentagon officials were "particularly concerned" about America's dependence on Japan for parts used in our most sophisticated weapons systems.

In fact, the article quoted Robert Burmeister of Hewlett-Packard Co., who serves on a National Academy of Science panel on electronic components, as saying: "In some cases you either buy from Japan or you don't get it."

Further, on two separate occasions last week, the Commerce Department determined that Japanese companies were dumping a major semiconductor product in the American market for the sole purpose of gaining dominance of our local market.

I guess that what bothers me most is that at the same time we find that companies from any number of countries are using unfair trading practices to gain control of our markets, we are forced to buy other goods from those countries of origin because they have forced American competition out of business.

It's happening in steel, machine tools, shipbuilding. It has already happened in consumer electronics, cameras, and so many other product lines, that it is nearly impossible to catalog them all. But what is most discouraging is the threat to America's ability to survive and protect itself.

I am constantly amazed that this administration, which projects itself as one of the most conscious of and concerned about our national security, still ignores the real threat that arises from our dependence on foreign goods for that defense and security.

And, looking at the case in the most generous of terms, it isn't that I believe any of the nations which export key defense material would turn against us so much as my concern that these goods are at greater risk of destruction while in transit between the country of manufacture and our shores.

In the early 1940's, when it was imperative for America to gear up its industrial machine to provide the tanks, planes, ships, and other necessary weapons and the steel and rubber we needed, we were able to find the basic resources here as well as the means of production. We had the capability to help ourselves.

□ 2125

Yes, it is true that a lot of that production capacity had been shut down during the Depression, but the plants, factories, machinery, and skilled workers were still here and ready to go.

Today's situation is far different and much more precarious. We weren't importing steel in the late 1930's and early 1940's. Today, for the full year of 1985, we imported just over 25 percent of our domestic supply.

In the late 1930's we were exporting steel and scrap. In 1985, steel exports from America hit an alltime modern low of 932 thousand tons. The previous record low was set in 1984 when we exported 980 thousand tons.

Last week, Secretary Baldrige was very positive, telling us that the President's program for limiting steel imports through a series of voluntary restraint agreements was working and would be very successful.

Personally, I am not so sure. The Secretary pointed to import downturns in the last quarter of 1985 and in January and February of this year. Well, if no one minds, I'd rather wait until the end of 1986 before I stand up to cheer.

In case no one remembers, 1985 started out in a similar way. After very high levels of imports in 1984—setting a new record of more than 26 million tons and reaching 26.4 percent of the American market, including a penetration level of 31.2 percent in December 1984—things started to turn around.

Import levels started falling: 30.9 percent in January; 27.1 percent in February; 24.5 percent in March; 23.2 percent in April. Everyone said the President's import plan was working.

After April, everything went crazy. Imports edged up in May, 23.4 percent; jumped substantially in June to 28.1 percent; fell sharply in July to 21.9 percent; rose to 25.4 percent in August; rose sharply to 30.5 percent in September; and, finally, for the last 3 months of 1985 came in at levels of 17.3 percent, 23.3 percent, and 27.2 percent for October, November, and December respectively.

In the comparisons between 1984, the record year, and 1985 show some moderation, but not nearly enough to have us jumping for joy, the annualized level of import penetration for 1985 was 25.3 percent, down slightly from the 1984 level of 26.4 percent, certainly not a harbinger of better things.

I hope Secretary Baldrige is right. I hope the President's program on steel does result in a substantial downturn in imports and a corresponding upturn in domestic steel production and growth in capacity.

My fear is that, even if it does work, the best we can hope for is to hold the line—no more plant closings and no more worker layoffs. Employment in the steel industry today is about 220,000, a sharp cry from just 10 years ago when employment was just about a half a million.

Most of us see a lot of changes still to come in the steel industry. Right now, individual companies in the industry are negotiating with the United Steelworkers for new contracts. Some of those contracts could spell life or death for some parts of the industry.

Just this past weekend, the LTV Steel Co. reached an agreement with its steelworkers that, according to what I have read and heard, could keep the company on track.

Although I don't have the full details, it is clear that the steelworkers, recognizing the need to help the company regain its competitiveness in today's market, agreed to reductions in wages by as much as $3 an hour in exchange for a profit sharing and stock program.

As I just said, the workers recognize that they will have to take an active part in keeping the industry alive and competitive so they will have jobs in the future.

But, Mr. Speaker, steel isn't the only industry feeling the pinch from imports. Not too long ago, an article in Business Week cited the problems facing the cement market in the United States.

According to the article, 14 million tons of cement are flowing into this country every year from Mexico, Spain, Venezuela, Japan, and South Korea, arriving at prices that are $10 to $20 a ton less than what it costs most domestic manufacturers to produce.

The list of industries that are facing these kinds of problems is almost endless. I recently had a visit from some constituents who represent the Cast Metals Federation. They brought me a tale of woe about the impact of uncontrolled levels of imports.

In this case, like the others, the numbers tell the whole story. In 1979, before the pressure from uncurbed imports, 740,000 Americans worked in foundries. In Pennsylvania alone, there were 350 foundries employing more than 35,000 people in 1975.

Today, the picture is startling. National employment in foundries has fallen to about 225,000; shipments are less than 11 million tons a year—from a high of 17 million tons, sales are down by 21 percent; and value has dropped from $22 billion to about $16 billion.

The story in Pennsylvania is much the same. Of those 350 foundries that were operating in 1975, only 240 are still working, a loss of 30 percent. And of those 35,000 jobs, only 20,000 remain. And the real danger is that unless we take some action, there will be fewer foundries and, certainly, fewer employment opportunities.

Congressman JOHN P. MURTHA, chairman of the Steel Caucus, and myself, as chairman of the executive committee of the Steel Caucus, in a letter dated March 18, 1986, addressed to Chairwoman Paula Stern, U.S. International Trade Commission, in Washington, took the following position—and I think it would be best that I read that letter into the RECORD. It is very short.

CONGRESSIONAL STEEL CAUCUS,
Washington, D.C., March 18, 1986.

Chairwoman PAULA STERN,
U.S. International Trade Commission, Washington, DC.

DEAR COMMISSIONER STERN: The Congressional Steel Caucus is gravely concerned with the severe impact imports have had and continue to have on our nation's foundry industry. We are therefore writing to you to express our strong support for the petition filed by the Cast Metals Federation under Section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974.

According to information we have received from the Cast Metals Federation, imports of the seven foundry castings covered under the petition have increased by more than 100 percent. Additional information indicates that the castings in question are being priced at as much as 50 percent below comparable castings produced in the United States.

In recent years, the foundry industry has been struggling under the rapid influx of imports. Since 1981, over 600 foundries have been forced to close and 160,000 workers have lost their jobs. National security is also at risk. Currently, over 10 percent of the industry's output is used directly for national defense purposes. Thus a healthy foundry industry is not only essential to the economy, but also to our national security. We urge you to recognize and remedy this desperate situation.

It is our understanding that an investigation into the petition has already begun. In expressing our support for this petition, we request that careful consideration be given to the findings and that appropriate relief be recommended. Strong and positive action must be taken to protect our country's continued economic growth and well being.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH M. GAYDOS,
Chairman, Executive Committee.
JOHN P. MURTHA,
Chairman.

The competition in the foundry business is coming from, among other places, India, a country that has no local market for the castings it produces. Strictly a "for export" business.

And, as in so many industries, the United States is the market of choice by India, Brazil, Mexico, and a host of other countries that see our open-door policy on trade as a way to provide jobs for their citizens and earn dollars from exports to meet their debts.

And, it shows. Last year, 1985, our trade deficit reached another all-time high, $148.5 billion. And in January of this year, the merchandise trade deficit jumped to $16.5 billion, $1.4 billion more than the $15.1 billion deficit for December 1985.

If we are so unfortunate as to have the January 1986 deficit as the benchmark for the year, we would expect a merchandise trade deficit for 1986 of $198 billion. And, to think, the 1983 merchandise trade deficit was under $100 billion.

If I may divert for a second, I can remember back, when we talk about the balance of trade and the balance of payments, every time there was a significant balance-of-trade deficit, those who were defending the situation would say, "Well, do not worry about the trade deficit, the balance of payments are way up. One cancels the other out."

Now we have both of them in horrendous imbalance, as I have just pointed out. What the results are going to be, nobody knows. Your guess is as good as mine.

The impact of this trade deficit and, perhaps, the lack of long-range policy insofar as trade is concerned, is the focus of the cover story in the March 10 issue of Business Week. Called "The Hollow Corporation," the article confirms something that those of us who used to have operating steel plants in our district have been saying for a long time—a nation cannot survive on a service economy. We can only have so many hotel jobs, office jobs, and other jobs that are not connected directly with the production of goods.

I, for one, can't understand why it has taken us so long to understand this simple proposition. The Japanese are very much aware of it and it's one of the reasons they keep a very tight rein on imports that would compete directly with products they manufacture.

The Business Week article quotes Tsutoma Ohshima, senior managing director of Toyota, who says: "You can't survive with just a service industry."

Ohshima finds it difficult to understand why American policymakers are not talking about the clear need to rebuild the basic industries that have been ravaged by rising imports in recent years.

The real question for us, both as a Congress and as a nation, is: How do we approach the problems and what kinds of solutions exist?

One thing is certain, the approaches taken by this administration are not working and are not likely to work. As I mentioned earlier, the Commerce Department cited Japanese firms for dumping in two instances. Now it will be up to the President to determine the final course of action.

In the recent past, findings by the International Trade Commission and the Commerce Department of damage to industries by virtue of imports hasn't had much effect on the administration. And, I guess we shouldn't expect too much action this time.

But, somewhere down the line, some action will have to be taken, whether it is to severely punish violating nations or to develop a domestic policy aimed at assisting aging industries to regain levels of competitiveness or a combination of both.

My concern and the concern of the Steel Caucus is that we may be waiting too long and that, at some point, there will be no industries left to assist.

CENTRAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I take the well this evening at this late hour to talk about an issue which has been of great concern to every American and to this Congress for the past several years. In fact, it has been debated since before I got here, and that is the question of Soviet expansion into Central America.

I have just returned from my first trip to Central America. I have, in the past, been as far south as Mexico City, but never before have I actually been into the region of Central America. Specifically El Salvador and Nicaragua.

Having studied in this country over the past several years the issue of Central America and the problems we have faced I felt that last Thursday, when an attempt was made to put together a bipartisan trip to the region that I would take that opportunity, cancel my commitments in California, knowing full well that a brief visit to Central America would not make me an expert on the region.

I did know that taking that trip would elucidate. I believe very much that we could have a chance to speak with all sides on this issue and I am very pleased to return and say that we did speak with all sides on this issue.

I went down there believing very strongly the Sandinista regime was a totalitarian regime. I returned to the United States knowing full well that it is, in fact, much worse than I had ever anticipated. I had heard about the atrocities which were taking place by both sides. I had heard about the oppression that was going on. I had heard about the censorship which took place in the media, I had heard about the horrible jail situation. I had heard about the problems facing the church in that area, but we can hear a lot of things but witnessing it is much, much different.

I have to say that our first meeting was like all of them, very moving. When we arrived Friday morning, we went to the offices of La Prensa, the truly independent voice of reason in Central America. Without a doubt, as we told them, a real example of an attempt made to provide a free exchange of ideas to the people.

We went into their office and sat down with the editorial board. We had the credibility of La Prensa very clearly demonstrated to us when we met with the editorial page editor, a very attractive woman named Christiana Chamorro. She is the daughter of Pedro Chamorro who, in fact was assassinated on the streets of Managua, many believe by the Somozan regime. The figure that I have been given is that about 90 percent of the people in Nicaragua believe that the assassination of Pedro Chamorro took place by Somozans.

We sat in this meeting with his daughter, and she is a very strong person. She is one who is consistently faced with the threat from the Sandinistas. Her father had been an opponent of the Somozan government. Why? Because he did not like that totalitarian pattern. He desperately wanted to see the kinds of freedoms that the 1979 revolution was designed to grant. That very important four-point platform. Free and fair elections; a democratic form of government; an end to human rights violations; and nonalignment.

That was a very impressive stated goal and it was one that the people of Nicaragua wanted and it is one that the people of Nicaragua continue to want. In fact, the way the situation stands, the 1979 revolution is continuing today as it was back then.

The unfortunate thing is that the people are fighting even greater oppression, even greater violations of human rights and an even stronger resolve on the part of the Communists to move in in a stronger way and take over.

We found in our meeting with Christiana Chamorro and her colleagues at La Prensa that the censorship today is much worse than it ever was under Anastasio Somoza. We were told that under the Somozan regime articles dealing with the military were consistently censored from being printed.

What do we see today? A situation that, as I say, is much worse. I happen to have with me a copy of a newspaper article or the front page of La Prensa of just several weeks ago. This particular page shows that articles dealing with the church and an attempt to place the church radio station back on the air are censored.

The process that La Prensa takes is as follows: They submit their copy to the Sandinista government, and upon submission of their paper, they wait for approximately 7 hours during the day. At the end of that 7-hour period, if they are lucky, sometimes the Sandinistas come in later, they get back about half of the paper, then they have to reset the entire paper because the Government will not allow them to simply pull an article out and leave blank space because then the people would know full well that censorship is taking place.

Sometimes as much as 85 percent of the paper is censored, and, on top of that, an attempt is made by the Government not only to remove articles that are submitted about the church, but to make the paper less and less attractive. Many people had believed that the articles that were censored were in fact posted throughout the city of Managua, or in fact in a spot where people could easily read it. Now under the Sandinistas, La Prensa can post the censored articles, but only within their compound and only within their property.

The people in Nicaragua have to move inside the compound of La Prensa to have an opportunity to read those censored articles. So it is a very, very difficult situation for them to try and get this newspaper out.

One of the most moving things was a statement made by Christiana who said to us when we were talking about why would someone want to stay here in this country? Why would someone want to stay here when they are faced with the kind of oppression that she deals with.

She told us about her father, her father who had, as I said earlier, been assassinated most believe by the Somozans because he was trying to get the message of oppression out to the people, and what we found was she spoke English, but she preferred to give this statement to us in Spanish, and through the translator she said:

My father taught us that we are the owners of our own fear.

That is the way the translation came through. Most of us inferred from that that the basic statement that she was making is that we are the masters of our own fear, and there was a tremendous strength and resolve knowing how she loved this country and the people who were continuing to fight for that original stated goal back in 1979 are loving the country and wanting desperately to see it come about. She has borne the brunt of the Sandinista regime.

In fact, one of her colleagues, Carlos Ramirez, sat there and looked up and at one point we asked him "What is it that had been done against you?" He said that he had been kidnaped, that he had been pulled out of his automobile and beaten. In other words, people associated with La Prensa continue to face even physical harm from the Government because they are sending this message out to 70,000 people at least as they have a cap on the number of papers they can print. It is 70,000 papers, and as the staff of the editorial board told us, of course every single one of those papers is immediately sold. Why? Because the people desperately want what truly is respected as the great voice of reason and balance in the region.

We had a number of very emotional meetings. In that La Prensa meeting they talked about continued censorship and we heard about the electronic media, the great wave throughout the United States and the free world has been great. People are able to witness all kinds of developments through the electronic media.

□ 2150

Well, we have heard repeatedly about how repressive the Somoza regime was. I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, that our colleagues know that under the Somoza regime there were 50 radio stations which had a wide range of messages that were broadcast throughout the country. Under the Somoza regime there were three television stations, two of them independent, one government station and two independent television stations.

Under the Sandinistas, there is one radio station and one television station, both of which offer the simple government message to the people, the message of the greatness of communism, and that is all that goes out over and over again.

There is no voice, and as I said earlier, there is a very strong attempt being made by the Catholic church to get back on the air, the church radio station. Not only have the Sandinistas pulled that radio station off the air, but as I pointed out, the lead article in La Prensa which talked about the attempt to get the Catholic radio station back on the air has in fact been censored, along with any article written about that great and courageous Cardinal, Obando y Bravo, whom the President mentioned in his address the other night.

I am very pleased that one of my colleagues who was part of that very important nine member delegation, which I said at the outset was intended to be a bipartisan trip, and while I enjoy traveling with Republicans, I would have certainly welcomed Democrats on the trip, but one of our Republicans, one of our colleagues who represents Houston, TX, a new Member, has joined me on the floor and I know would like to make some comments about that trip, as it was for him, too, the first trip to Nicaragua.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I really appreciate the gentleman taking this special order to try to tell the Members of this House and the American people what we saw in Managua.

As the gentleman has so ably pointed out, our trip to the La Prensa newspaper and showed some of the censored articles, I have with me the articles that are censored also, but in the government documents of censorship and these documents are signed by the member of the Ministry of the Interior listing those articles that were censored.

Mr. DREIER of California. Tomas Borge.

Mr. DELAY. That is right, Tomas Borge. These were censored.

I think the gentleman would be interested to know what some of these articles that were censored say. Now these are in Spanish and I had to translate them with my primitive Spanish capabilities.

Mr. DREIER of California. We are all very impressed with the gentleman's Spanish, as was demonstrated for us down in Nicaragua.

Mr. DELAY. I appreciate that, but these articles show I think very graphically, the articles that were censored show graphically what is happening in Managua and in Nicaragua and if the people of Nicaragua could see what is happening through a free press, I think we would not even be here debating this issue of giving aid to the freedom fighters; but right on the front page of this particular day that was censored, March 12 by the way, last week, these are the articles that were censored, there is an article that is entitled "When the Military Raided Their House and Machine Gunned a Family," that is what this says, they machinegunned a family in Nicaragua, and it says, "Three evangelical family members, a lady and her underaged son were machinegunned down by 20 military Sandinistas." They were at their house praying at 7 o'clock the night of the 28th of February.

Mr. DREIER of California. That would be of course the reason they were machinegunned down, because they were on their knees praying.

Mr. DELAY. That is exactly right, and it points out where it happened, in Las Carpas, Rancho Grande, of this jurisdiction.

The rural evangelical Matilde Ochoa Vilchez and her sons Tito and Lazaro were assassinated while Mrs. Fidelo Martinez, wife and mother, respectively, of the three dead, was gravely wounded, together with another child of her's. The mother and child are hospitalized and the attackers that came to their aid because their victims were anti-Sandinista collaborators.

Like we have said before, these are articles that were censored.

Now, it is interesting to note in another day that was censored, and it points out another article, these were the articles censored on the 11th of March, there is an article right here entitled "Nicaragua is urged to adopt disarmament by the Contadora."

It goes on to say that Nicaragua was urged today—and by the way, this is a DPA article.

Mr. DREIER of California. So what the gentleman is telling us then is that the encouragement for disarmament of Nicaragua by the Contadora group was in no way communicated whatsoever to the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. DELAY. That is absolutely right. It says:

Nicaragua was urged today to set aside its obstinance and accept the latest proposal to disarm by the Contadora group and in this manner assist the establishing of a constructive peace in Central America.

That is an article in La Prensa in Managua.

Mr. DREIER of California. I think it was also very interesting to note that the day we were there, Friday, March 14, was to the day the fourth anniversary of censorship being imposed by the Sandinistas on the people of Nicaragua and specifically on La Prensa.

Mr. DELAY. Is it not incredible that a country that does have a free press can point out the abuses of its government, even here in the United States, but in this case, and here is another article right here, "Baldizon Denuncia Trafico de Drogas," and what that says is, "Baldizon Denounces Drug Trafficking," and this is an AP story carried by La Prensa and the translation of this article very quickly is:

An Anti and Ex-Functionary of the Nicaraguan government said today in Congress that various members of his government have for sometime been involved in the contraband of cocaine from South America to the United States.

Jose Alvaro Baldizon Aviles, ex-special investigator for the Ministry of the Interior of Nicaragua said that the drug traffic; was controlled by Tomas Borge, Minister of Interior, and the chief of police of Nicaragua.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank the gentleman for his fine contribution.

I am trying to go through our schedule at this point and talk about our program during the day that we were there. I thought it important that we cover not only the La Prensa meeting, but go through some of the other detailed meetings, and the gentleman is more than welcome to jump in at any time to comment on some of these items.

I see the leader of our delegation has entered the Chamber. I have just completed a detailed explanation of our meeting to that wonderful voice of reason, La Prensa. The gentleman worked very hard putting the trip together and served as the lead member of what became known as Codel-Walker, and I am happy to yield now to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman yielding. I appreciate the gentleman taking this time.

As the gentleman may know, earlier this evening I did put into the RECORD the entire brief on our trip that was prepared by the individual Members, the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] included. I hope that tomorrow the Members will have an opportunity to look in detail at some of the things that we saw and heard there as a result of putting together that report.

I think taking a few minutes as the gentleman is this evening to kind of describe it in detail is very important.

I thought the one thing I would like to reflect on for a moment is something that is almost a humorous incident that took place there, that we thought was rather significant, and that was in our meeting with the Vice President of Nicaragua, Sergio Ramirez. At one point one of our members of our delegation got him talking about elections and Mr. Ramirez indicated that indeed he understood elections and that his term was up in 1991. There was all of a sudden some scurrying around the table near him and so on as his aides began talking among each other and one of them whispered to him and he finally said, "Oh, let me correct that. My term is up in 1990."

It struck us at that moment as rather humorous, because there is no truly elected politician anywhere in the world who does not know the hour and the day that his term is up.

Mr. DREIER of California. That clearly demonstrates what a fraud that 1984 election was. Many of us have been saying it here, but there is no doubt whatsoever in our minds that if the vice president of a country is off by a year in determining when his term is to expire, it is clear that it is an insignificant date to him, because it is obvious that tyrannical rule is scheduled to continue.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman is absolutely correct. It was obvious that the second in command in the Government in Nicaragua was not particularly worried about when he might have to face the voters the next time. It is obvious that their only concern is how to hold onto power, the same way they came to power, and that is at the barrel of a gun.

So I think that we have seen firsthand that tyranny is precisely what is going on in Nicaragua. They have no hesitancy to describe themselves as Marxist-Leninist Communists.

Mr. DREIER of California. Although the Vice President at our meeting tried to claim that they were a democracy.

Mr. WALKER. Oh, yes. Well, that is the thing which is confusing, I think, to many Americans. Many Americans go down and hear them use that kind of language.

Mr. DREIER of California. Yet his colleague who refused for some reason to show up for our meeting had just returned from a meeting of the 27th Congress of the Communist Party in Moscow. I think it is important to point out that we were extraordinarily concerned about that, because the Vice President, Acting President Sergio Ramirez, said to us that they were in fact no way allied with the Soviet Union. To us it was very clear that they had blatantly violated that original goal of the Sandinistas to overthrow the Somoza government back in 1979, yet when they had one of their top officials, one of the nine comandantes, a member of that nine-member directorate attending that meeting in Moscow, I see no better evidence that they are clearly allied with the Soviet Union.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to my very good friend, the gentleman from San Diego, CA.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman yielding. I want to thank my friends who took this trip. I think it was extremely important to take it at this time, to the visibility that was given, to the realities of that Government in Managua was extremely important for the country.

I am reminded of the statements by Arturo Cruz, who was the presidential candidate, the independent candidate who ran against the Communist candidate in Nicaragua, and his comments about the fairness of that election. He stated that time after time wherever he went he was faced by armed mobs that were put up to this by the Sandinistas, who, to quote him, spat on him, hit him in the face with rocks and pulled his hair.

It is no wonder that he got out of the race, had to withdraw from the race, because the Sandinistas had no intention to give him a fair race.

I am reminded also of the statement by Mr. Ortega who told his friends when they had to have this election, he said:

> Let me remind you that the purpose of this election is to hold on to revolutionary power, not to lose it.

It is obvious that the only reason they held those elections was to appear legitimate in the eyes of the world.

Biardo Arce, one of the nine comandantes, put it very well in a secret communication when he said, "The reason we have to do this is to appear to be legal."

He said, "We are going to be like the couple that has been living together and now we are legalized and it is going to make things a lot easier for us."

Mr. DREIER of California. It was Commandante Arce who was scheduled to meet with us. We of course were going to challenge him because he was the comandante who was in Moscow at the meeting of the 27th Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me tell my friend that maybe it was very fortunate that he did not meet with Comandante Arce, because Nelson Perez, who was a Managua taxicab driver, according to the Human Rights Commission, made the mistake of appearing at a meeting in which Comandante Arce appeared and his last public act before the word was sent to his widow that he died of a sudden heart attack was booing Comandant Arce. He was arrested later that night by uniformed Sandinstas and three days later he was told, and pardon me, I have to correct that, he was not told, the widow was not told by the Sandinistas that he died of a heart attack. They were told, or she was told that he unfortunatley attempted to escape and had to be shot.

□ 2205

His crime was booing the comandante at a union meeting for taxicab drivers.

So knowing my friend's feelings toward this Communist government, maybe it is a good thing that Comandante Arce was not there, because a few harsh words toward him might mean we would have one less vote or maybe several less votes.

Mr. DREIER of California. Possibly nine less.

Mr. HUNTER. Tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. DREIER of California. I think that is a very good point to make. In light of that point, I think it is very important we shift to the second meeting we had which was with the local permanent commission on human rights, the only truly independent commission. Why do I say it is important for us to shift to that? Well, because we consistently hear, mostly from this side of the aisle, about the blatant violations to human rights being perpetrated by the Contras. We hear that the Contras have a pattern of shooting men and raping women and, in fact, the Sandinistas, while they may be guilty of irregularities, it is nothing more than that. I think it is important to give a little report on the meeting that we had with that human rights commission.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I think it is important to some extent to establish the credibility of the commission you are about to talk about.

Mr. DREIER of California. That is exactly what I was prepared to do.

Mr. WALKER. Because when I got home, I found a couple of my well-intentioned constituents who have been to Nicaragua and feel that they know the situation down there are claiming that the Permanent Commission on Human Rights is a CIA-funded operation in Nicaragua.

Mr. DREIER of California. It was made very clear to us that all of the funding for that Permanent Human Rights Commission comes from within Nicaragua, from the people of Nicaragua. They laid that out for us.

The other item which demonstrates their credibility in an unbelievable way is that they were initiated not 4 or 5 years ago under the Sandinista regime but, in fact, 9 years ago in 1977 when they were complaining and trying to take actions against the very blatant and gross violations of human rights being perpetrated by the Anastasio Somoza regime. It was very clear that they had helped and aided prisoner Tomas Borge back in the late 1970's, and here they are today continuing that same effort, reporting to us that the human rights violations under the Somoza regime, while horrible, pale to the kinds of human rights violations that we are seeing under the Sandinistas regime.

The also made it very clear to us that the prison system has become much, much worse today then it ever was under Anastasio Somoza. They used to have bars on the doors that would provide people at least some semblance of an ability to communicate. Yet today the doors are metal and dark. It was a joke, a tragic joke when Vice President Ramirez informed us that they had model prisons. From what we heard from this truly independent human rights commission, the prisons are worse than they could ever imagine with as many as 2,000 people in a prison designed to hold only 500, no sanitary facilities whatsoever, and ventilation which only comes through a pipe going up to the ceiling. It is very obvious that this human rights commission is one which does focus attention on human rights violations being perpetrated not only by the Sandinistas, but also by the Contras.

What did they say to us?

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DELAY. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but I think that we really need to expand on what a prison is, because sometimes to the people of the United States when you say prison, they think of an American prison.

Mr. DRIER of California. I want to reclaim my time, and I very much want to get into the details of the prison system, but I think first it is very important that we get back to this question, which I will do very briefly, and then I will be happy to yield to my friend from Texas about this situation which exists on the Contra violations of human rights. This truly independent human rights commission pointed out to us that yes, there have been human rights violations perpetrated by the Contras, and yes, years ago ranchers in the northern part of the country had a pattern of going in and yes, raping women and shooting men. But what they said to us, and the chairman of our delegation I know remembers this very well, what they said to us is that under the Sandinista regime, the reports which have come out from the government human rights organization is that when the Contras are perpetrating human rights violations, they are referred to as atrocities. That is what is reported, not only by the Sandinista government, but by the media in the United States of America and throughout the free world. He said that when the Sandinistas perpetrate human rights violations they are, in fact, only irregularities. What they then said to us is that it is basically the reverse.

We are not saying that the Contras are angels. But what we are saying, based on this human rights commission which has provided us with a full and very clear report and credibility, based on the fact that they are getting their funding from within Nicaragua, and based on the fact that they have been concerned about human rights violations since before Anastasio Somoza was overthrown, they made it very clear to us that the concern is that the Contras' human rights violations have been dramatically reduced, whereas the Sandinista human rights violations have been on the increase.

We had a great many problems in dealing with the prison question, and I know that my good friend from Texas has a very great interest in expanding on that, as this has in effect become his specialty. So I am more than happy, and was sorry to reclaim my time but I thought it was very important that we demonstrate the credibility of the human rights commission.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield, I appreciate the gentleman reclaiming his time for that statement because his statement is absolutely important in pointing out the human rights violations of the Communist government in Nicaragua. But there are some details in his eloquence that were left out that I think are vitally important.

No. 1, when Americans think of prisons, they think of American prisons. The gentleman said that in this case the prisons in Nicaragua, and I think it is interesting to note that Somoza, the bad man Somoza, who was bad, by the way, had only two prisons in all of Nicaragua, and the one prison that they did have was a Federal prison and now has been increased in size by three times by the Communist government in Nicaragua. Not only that, they have built 8 more State security prisons, and 11 Federal prisons, so we have 20 prisons in a nation of 2½ to 3 million people, the size of the Houston-Galveston metroplex in Texas, 20 prisons not counting every city has 1 jail in Nicaragua. But these prisons, as the gentleman pointed out, were remodeled, not for the benefit of the inmates in these prisons, but were remodeled by taking the bars off the doors and putting metal doors on the cells. There are no lights in the cells, and the ventilation, as the gentleman pointed out, is a pipe through the ceiling. No plumbing whatsoever so that the inmates are turned out into the yard three times a day to take care of their personal needs, go to the bathroom and whatever. The water is turned on for 15 minutes once a day to get water and to take care of any bathing that they can possibly do by getting the water and bathing in 15 minutes.

These are horrendous conditions, and there are 20, 20 prisons in a nation of 2½ to 3 million people.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

□ 2215

Mr. RITTER. On this very same subject, there are between 11,000 and 13,000 political prisoners in Nicaragua. This is by a landslide the largest number of political prisoners in the Western Hemisphere. They have to build all of these new prisons in order to house all the political prisoners.

Now, Chile, which has a rightwing dictatorship has half or less the political prisoners that are in Nicaragua, and Nicaragua has one quarter of the population of Chile, and it just goes to show how active they are in putting away their dissenters.

The irony is that the country is dirt poor, that the people are dirt poor, that in the years the Sandinistas have been in power, inflation has progressed at hundreds of percent a year. The economy, the bottom of the economy has dropped out. People do not have work; people do not have jobs.

Mr. DREIER of California. This evening we saw on the evening news a report on CBS which was unbelievable; about the inflation rate to which the gentleman alluded. It has skyrocketed, and there were photographs of the grocery stores: empty shelves, it was impossible to in any way purchase eggs and the price of meat had dramatically increased.

Mr. RITTER. The irony is, with that going on, they are building these prisons apace.

Now, we saw aerial photographs of these prisons, and I presented these aerial photographs in a special order the other evening, and these are quality large-scale construction projects that tap the very lifeblood of this starving, poverty-stricken nation to build prisons to put political prisoners in while the people do not have enough to eat.

Mr. DREIER of California. Maybe that is the reason tha acting President/Vice President Sergio Ramirez told us when we posted the question to him "What about this tremendous expansion of prisons?" He said there was no expansion of prisons, first, and maybe that is the reason he said that they have model prisons. He used the term "model prisons" with us in our meeting, and maybe it is the fact that they are among the newest prisons, because of the expansion effort that he has going.

I am happy to yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield, I will tell you about their model prisons that they parade people that come down to look at Nicaragua, about what a great government they are; and there are many people that do that, especially on the religious left; that come down for a week, go through the Communist government's program.

There are two prisons that quite frankly could be called model prisons. The inmates in these prisons are inmates that are brought from the other prisons there are inmates that have informed for the Sandinistas, that are there because of good behavior, and for one thing or another, are brought there; and when these delegations are paraded before them, and other reports, frankly, the Wesley report has shown that they bought them new baseball uniforms; they put them in baseball uniforms, had them out there playing baseball before the delegations got there; the delegations take pictures of these happy prisoners playing baseball. Once the delegation has gone, they pull them back into the cells, take off the uniforms, and they are back in their normal conditions.

I guess that is called a model prison. They also put on shows and picnics, and they sing for the delegations——

Mr. DREIER of California. That clearly demonstrates why Vice President Ramirez, when we asked him if we could go and see one of those prisons, he responded by saying: "It wouldn't be convenient now." They obviously have to go through the process of bringing out the baseballs and getting the people outside—and if on short notice we were to go out there, we would see the situation as it really exists.

I am happy to continue to yield to my friend from Texas [Mr. DELAY].

Mr. DELAY. He also promised that if we cared to do so, we could come back, on our own time, at our own schedule, and get in our own car with our own pictures and our own maps and travel anywhere in the country—this open country he is talking about—and look at these so-called prisons that we talk about that he denies that are there.

We could even go to El Bluff, the deepwater port that is being built by the Soviets and Bulgarians—that he denied that was there. We can do all these things because he knows we would be embarassed because we could not find these prisons.

It is going to be interesting, because I am going back—if he will let me—and I am going to look for those prisons, and I am going to El Bluff and I am going to Punto Juerte, the airfield that is to house the bombers and fighters that are coming in by the—sent by the Soviets.

Mr. DREIER of California. And the gentleman knows full well who will be traveling with him.

Mr. DELAY. The gentleman from California, and probably this gentleman from California, and hopefully the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN], and I hope we will have a delegation. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUSTAMANTE] sitting in the chair would come with us also.

Mr. RITTER. Will the gentleman in the well yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. It is interesting, this technique of creating this model situation for visitors. There is nothing new in this. The Soviets, in the 1930's, in welcoming visitors from Western countries would do this at their gulag camps; they would do this at their concentration camps.

They would fatten up the inmates for 2 or 3 weeks; they would get them haircuts and give them shaves and get them clothing and put on a real show. As soon as the visitors left, as soon as the visitors left they would go back to the standard concentration camp, Soviet-style, called the gulag, and literally, you know, destroy the inmates.

I have a book here which is called "Nicaraguan Human Rights Abuses, an Update," and it is done by a man named Wesley Smith. It was published on February 18, 1986, and he talks about the human rights abuses and the incredible ill treatment in the prisons.

I guess my question to you is, "Why is it that we know so little in this debate, in the United States, about all the abuses of the Communist government in Nicaragua? Why is it that we hear so much about what the Contras did, but we never hear very much about what the Sandinistas are doing?"

Is it because the society is so closed and secret?

Mr. DREIER of California. Well, I think it is clear that with the exception of the local independent commission on human rights, the other human rights organizations, which are reporting to the United States and to the free world are in fact controlled by the Sandinista government. There is no doubt in my mind whatsoever that there are violations by the Contras; and we cannot ignore them. That is why I believe it is important that we focus attention on the issue, because this one truly independent human rights organization, which has been concerned about human rights since the days of Anatole Somoza, is saying that the human rights violations of the Contras now are significantly reduced juxtaposed to those being perpetrated by the Contras.

So you are absolutely right; the gentleman is correct in stating—and I would like to congratulate the gentleman for all of his efforts. I have seen him take the well for the last several days, addressing this issue, and it is important that we focus attention on this so that our colleagues are elucidated and are well aware——

Mr. RITTER. I think the gentleman makes a very good point. So much of the flow of information out of Nicaragua is controlled by the government. So you have La Prensa, which the gentleman talked about earlier, in a position to barely utter an uncensored peep, as the only viable Nicaraguan source of information, and you have the Communist government in control of newspapers, in control of radio, in control of television, in control of a disinformation scheme which involves the Cubans and the Soviets and their allies worldwide.

I believe this is probably part of the reason why in general the American people are not quite aware just how bad these Sandinista Communists are, just how dangerous a threat they pose to their neighbors and really to the long-term safety of the people of the United States.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank the gentleman for his very fine contribution, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a couple of questions about our trip, which I think are very important for us to point out to our colleagues.

First of all, I showed earlier a photograph of the La Prensa issue which referred to the attempts being made by the Catholic Church to get their radio station back on the air.

I wonder if the gentleman might repeat for us the information about previous radio stations under the Somoza regime compared with the situation as it exists today.

Mr. DELAY. I think it is interesting to note, and I thank the gentleman for yielding, that under Somoza, a regime that we all abhor and do not support, under this so-called regime, at that time there were 50 independent radio stations, and 3, I believe, TV stations.

At the present time——

Mr. DREIER of California. Excuse me, just to correct the record, there were a total of 50 radio stations and a total of 3 television stations there. Of course, included in those numbers was the government radio station and the government television station; two of those three television stations were independent.

□ 2225

Mr. DELAY. That is exactly right. Right now today there are two government television stations and one government radio station under the Communist government in Nicaragua.

The Catholic radio station back in I think it was—and correct me if I am wrong—September, just because Cardinal Obando y Bravo made the statement that the greatest gift to man that God has given is freedom, and he made that statement in his homily, the radio station was shut down for 3 days.

Mr. DREIER of California. Actually it was January 1, 1986, January 1 of this year that the radio station was taken off the air.

Mr. DELAY. But in the case I am describing, leading up to January 1, the radio station was closed down for 3 days because Cardinal Obando y Bravo made that one little statement that made it look like he was for freedom and the Sandinistas were not for freedom. Then on January 1, as the gentleman explained, the Catholic radio station was closed, the newsletter put out by the Catholic Church——

Mr. DREIER of California. La Iglesia.

Mr. DELAY. Was forbidden to be put to the Catholics. We will get to Obando y Bravo I hope along with your description of the stops that we made.

Mr. DREIER of California. It is important to point out, since we are specifically referring to the electronic media, one of the most unbelievable things that they did. We sat in our meeting with Cardinal Obando y Bravo, whom the President referred to in his very eloquent address to the American people Sunday night, we talked to him for 10 or 15 minutes. There was a very quiet padre sitting right next to him. Very little was said. Then all of a sudden our colleague from California, Congressman DORNAN, said, "Well, tell us about the incident where the father had been stripped of his clothes and taken in the streets."

Cardinal Obando y Bravo lifted his left hand and pointed and said, "Here is Father Bismarck Carbello," who, in fact, was the father who was stripped of his clothes and paraded down the streets of Managua and film coverage was being made by the television station and that television station was carrying this message to the people of Nicaragua in an attempt to discredit the church. Very simply what happened was the father was called on a mission to a home. When he got there he was stripped of his clothing and taken out into the streets and the report on the television was that they had found Father Bismarck Carbello having an affair with a woman and they dragged him out in an attempt to show that those vows that he had taken were meaningless and that was their attempt to totally discredit the church.

Mr. RITTER. Could I ask the gentleman in the well a question? Why is it that the Sandinista Communists are so repressive of the Catholic Church? Why is it that they go to such great lengths to repress the Catholic Church?

Mr. DREIER of California. As we all know with an 85-percent Catholic nation, which Nicaragua is, it is very difficult for them because religious freedom is something that people throughout the world are continuing to seek, as we all know, and what has happened here is with so many Roman Catholics in this country it is absolutely essential that they do everything that they can to stave off that kind of freedom because they know that freedom of expression is a real threat to their repressive tyrannical regime.

Mr. RITTER. I think they may have witnessed what happened in Poland with Solidarity, with the Catholic Church taking the part of the oppressed people and became, at one point, a counter to the Communist regime. Communism, I think, finds great difficulty with religious belief because they want the people to have only one god and that is the god of the state. And that does conflict with the god of a particular religion.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DREIR of California. I thank my friend for his contribution. I am again happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Very pleased again to listen to the facts that you brought back from your mission to Nicaragua. I recall and understand that when La Inglesia was printed and was readied for distribution, and that is the church newspaper, on I believe it was October 22 of last year, and the truck left the church headquarters where the printing equipment was——

Mr. DREIER of California. October 12.

Mr. HUNTER. I stand corrected. It left the headquarters and started to distribute the church newspaper at the various churches. It was stopped by the Sandinista secret police and they forced the driver to retrace his route and pick up the church newspaper at each stop where they had delivered them until they finally got back to the church, and at that point armed secret policemen came in and confiscated the actual printing equipment and that was the last time that La Inglesia has operated, in fact was even printed. Is that accurate?

Mr. DREIER of California. That is exactly right. It is a very tragic loss to the people who are striving to get that kind of information.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me ask the gentleman this question, I think it is something that bothers a lot of us who have seen these facts. Again I do not see anybody on the Democratic side when we debate these in open session—our friends on the other side of the aisle are not here right now, but they will have a chance tomorrow. But nobody disputes those facts. Nobody disputes the fact that they took one of the bishops from a Catholic Church and threw him out naked in the streets and paraded him before pre-positioned television cameras, nobody disputes the fact that they have censored Archbishop Obando y Bravo or that they censored the church, they censored the masses that he gave, and they have closed down the Catholic newspaper and confiscated the presses. Yet today you see a number of Catholic people in this country and Catholic priests, members of the clergy saying that the problem is our fault in Nicaragua and that we should stop "oppressing the people of Nicaragua."

Mr. DREIER of California. The gentleman is absolutely right. It is a very important point to make. Why? Because, I am not Roman Catholic, but I understand within the church there is a term known as "collegiality." What does that term "collegiality" mean in the Roman Catholic Church? It means the church leaders from throughout the world have a responsibility to rely on the highest-ranking church leader within that country facing the problem. Cardinal Obando y Bravo is without doubt the highest-ranking church official there and his message is clearly different than the message we continue to hear from throughout this country from so many church leaders.

Mr. HUNTER. Do you think the church leaders in this country know that Father Carbello was thrown out naked in the streets? Do they know La Inglesia was closed down, that Cardinal Obando y Bravo was censored? Do they know that they mocked the Pope on his visit with the use of very strategically placed microphones during the mass he attempted to give?

Mr. DREIER of California. If the American people will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow they will very clearly see your account and very eloquent outline of those tragic details.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman and my colleague for going down and taking this trip because I think the problem has been that the American people do not know those facts.

Mr. DREIER of California. You know it is an interesting commentary to make, that we were criticized, in fact one reporter as we were getting ready to leave at the airport said, "Aren't the terms 'factfinding' and '1-day mission' contradictory?" Many people believed as I said at the opening of this special order, there is no way that we with a 1½-day mission to Nicaragua can become experts on the area. But in fact when one looks at June 1944 there was a very important day there, known as "the longest day."

I have learned a lot of things in my life in 1 day. I offered that as a response.

No, we are not experts, we have not have been there as long as others have. But we had a wide range of meetings, we met with government officials, we met, yes, with the opposition, but we also met with Americans like Gary Merrill, the actor, the actor who was with Witnesses for Peace. The gentleman from Texas and I had a chance to speak with him when we were there in the country. So in that 1 day we in fact packaged a lot of meetings starting at 5 o'clock in the morning when we prepared to leave here and until very late at night with business leaders who were talking about confiscation of property and problems that are reprehensible there.

I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

□ 2235

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman.

I just want to go back to the Cardinal Obando y Bravo. Cardinal Obando y Bravo was an opponent of the Somoza regime, and he was termed Papa Roja, the Red Pope, by Somoza. So Cardinal Obando y Bravo was a democrat.

The problem down there is all democrats, whether they be in the organized democratic resistance or the organized, what is left of it, the vestiges of some of the democratic political parties, or whether they be in free trade unions, or whether they be in the economic sense in the kind of business community that we talk about, these elements of society have been institutionally demolished by what is a growing, expanding totalitarian central government, really modeled on the Soviet Union and Cuba.

I was in Nicaragua, in all of Central America, and Cuba in July. I went on a trip with the Intelligence Committee. There is one thing you know when you cross the border into a Communist country just from being around the people, whether they are those in charge or whether they are those who are repressed. You know that you are in a Communist country because you can feel it. You can feel it in your gut. You can feel it in your heart. It is like when you cross Checkpoint Charlie into East Berlin. It is like another world.

Mr. DREIER of California. It is a very emotional experience. I have felt it only twice, the most recent time was, of course, last weekend. I felt it before when I was in Hanoi, and it is literally mind-boggling when you go in and see the kinds of problems that exist.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman will yield further, I lived for 1 year in the Soviet Union. I speak fluent Russian. It is so striking that the Communist all over the world have this likeness to the gray, repressive kind of fearsome feeling that you get when you are in the Soviet Union. Cuba has it, too.

The irony is that the Communists say they are going to bring a better life to the people, and they further impoverish the people as they have done in Nicaragua.

When we were in Nicaragua, nothing worked. Everything was falling apart. The people were gray and kind of sullen. As I understand it, in the last 6 months, things have gotten markedly worse, since July. And then you ask the question: How far down do the things go before something happens? I guess this is a very, very critical point. If things are so bad there, yet the repression is so strong, it must mean that there is a potential for a mass rising against this Communist government if the opportunity existed.

Mr. DREIER of California. There is no doubt whatsoever.

Going back to what I had counted on seeing on the evening news on the major networks, the economic situation there—and I think it is important to point out, too, that the opening statement made to us as we sat down, which sort of threw us all back into our chairs, as the gentleman from Texas I know remembers, from Cardinal Obando y Bravo was, "Our economy is destroyed." That was the opening statement made by the cardinal.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania points out very well, if the ceremony is destroyed, what better basis is there without any kind of hope of a next meal or a roof over one's head, that is certainly the basis for an uprising.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman will yield further, I think we all need to understand that just a decayed system, just a destroyed economy, just an impoverished people do not throw off the chains of Communist oppression. We have seen it in Poland. Solidarity was 10 million strong. They have done some polling in Poland, and they found that there is some 2 percent of the people, that is 2 out of 100 percent, support the regime. Yet the regime is still in power because they are the only ones that have the guns.

Mr. DREIER of California. I would like to say as this special order draws to a close that it is very important for us to focus attention on what is going to be considered right here in this House of Representatives Thursday afternoon. That is that the President, for a very important reason, went on the television Sunday evening, and that is because he is asking the American people to contact our colleagues in this Congress, Members of the House of Representatives, and Members of the other body, to urge them to support this package.

Before the gentleman from California leaves the Chamber, I would like the gentleman to outline for us why he believes it is important that the people who are in this country looking at this issue do contact their Representatives.

THE BIOTECHNOLOGY SCIENCE COORDINATION ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FUQUA] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill to coordinate the Federal Government's review of the release into the environment, use in manufacturing, and distribution in commerce, of genetically engineered organisms. This bill, entitled "The Biotechnology Science Coordination Act of 1986," requires EPA or USDA approval before these organisms can be released, used or distributed outside of containment areas or laboratories.

The international race in biotechnology is on. The participants in this race realize that the promise biotechnology products hold for agriculture, medicine, hazardous waste treatment and many other fields portends great economic benefits for the producers of these products. But this race does not and should not belong only to the swift—it must belong to the swift and safe. And that is what this bill is intended to ensure. This legislation is intended to encourage the successful growth of the biotechnology industry in this country by allowing safe biotechnology products to travel a clear and certain path from the laboratory to the marketplace.

We in Congress have the responsibility to provide a fair, predictable and informed regulatory system in the area of biotechnology. Recent lawsuits aimed at slowing or stopping the utilization of genetically engineered products shows that success in this field is hardly a matter of mere technical know-how. Rather, it is a matter of winning and sustaining public confidence that this new technology can be safely used to enhance, not endanger, our lives and our environment. To create and keep this confidence, we must ensure, each step along the way, that we are doing all we can to balance the enormous promise of biotechnology with the unique risks this technology may pose.

There are those who argue that Federal regulation of biotechnology will hinder America's ability to compete internationally, and that the products of biotechnology should be approached in the same manner as the products of other processes. But the ability of the biotechnology process to alter the genetic nature of living things makes it inevitable that this process will not be treated as just another technology. The American public will expect proof, not mere assurance, that this new technology can be safely used in the environment.

We are on the threshold of an explosion in the use of genetically engineered products. For that reason, the Science and Technology Committee commissioned a study from the General Accounting Office to determine the extent to which the Department of Agriculture was funding research in biotechnology, which might lead to the release into the environment of genetically engineered organisms.

The GAO report revealed that there are at least 87 USDA-funded biotechnology projects, which will involve the intentional release of genetically engineered products, and the majority of these releases will occur in the next 5 years. In only three of the projects was risk assessment part of the study. Concerned about how the Federal Government would cope with the volume of releases, the Investigations and Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Science and Technology held a hearing last December to examine the Federal Government's preparedness to regulate the deliberate release of genetically engineered organisms. Testimony at the hearing revealed that USDA does not require formal review and approval of the deliberate release of certain genetically engineered organisms.

EPA officials testified regarding EPA's recent approval of the first ever deliberate release of a genetically engineered organism. EPA assured the subcommittee that it could regulate the release of genetically engineered organisms under existing statutes as interpreted by interim policy guidelines.

But testimony at the hearing made it clear that there is no uniform, well-considered Federal policy toward the deliberate release of genetically engineered organisms. Instead, the agencies are relying on a piecemeal approach that uses existing statutes not written with genetically engineered organisms in mind.

The absence of a policy was especially troublesome to representatives of the biotechnology industry.

Industry witnesses forcefully pointed out that other nations, especially Japan, are proceeding at full speed in biotechnology, while industry in this country waits for each individual Federal agency to decide just what biotechnology is and how it should be regulated. One company which had developed a disease-resistant strain of tobacco waited nearly 3 years for approval of an outdoor experiment while Government agencies debated over who should review the request for approval.

The subcommittee's December hearing pointed out that the absence of a clear Federal role would continue to hinder the growth of the American biotechnology industry. Conversely, coordinated and predictable Federal policy would add certainty to the regulatory process and build public confidence in the use of this technology.

Events since the December hearing have only reinforced the need for more effective Federal scrutiny of biotechnology. In February 1986, it was discovered that the site EPA had approved for the first field test of a genetically engineered organism was located in a residential neighborhood in Monterey County, CA. EPA, it was learned, had not visited the site of the field test. The company, for its part, had neglected to inform the local government or the local citizenry of its plans to conduct a field test in a residential neighborhood near thousands of people and food crops.

The Monterey County Board of Supervisors imposed a 45-day moratorium on the first field test experiment. This action by the citizens of Monterey County dispelled any doubts that may have existed that public confidence is a key ingredient in the success of biotechnology.

On March 4, 1986, the Investigations and Oversight Subcommittee held a hearing to examine allegations that the company which had received the first-ever approval to field test had deliberately released a genetically-engineered organism into the environment 9 months before EPA gave the company approval to do so. At the hearing, the company admitted that it had indeed conducted outdoor rooftop experiments, under the belief that the EPA interim policy allowed such tests. EPA expressed surprise and concern that this occurred. This and other testimony at the March hearing illustrated that events have already outpaced the ability of the various agencies to regulate biotechnology in their present piecemeal fashion.

The confusion surrounding this first release of a genetically-engineered organism shows why the public is viewing biotechnology and the Government's regulation of biotechnology with a cautious eye. Unless and until fears associated with biotechnology are seriously addressed by the Government and the industry, the benefits of biotechnology will not be fully tapped. The power of biotechnology to change our world creates responsibilities that cannot be overlooked or avoided.

The December and March hearings pointed out several reasons why we need the kind of review and regulations which the bill I am introducing today provides. First, there is a need to locate and draw on the scientific expertise already existing in the various agencies and thereby facilitate Federal review. Second, there is a need for basic research into the interaction of organisms in the environment so that we can develop a data base to support the regulation of biotechnology.

Finally, the December and March hearings showed that there is an undeniable need for the Federal Government to articulate a clear and predictable regulatory policy regarding biotechnology. This policy should include a clear delegation of regulatory authority among the various Federal agencies, a sure path for industry to follow in marketing a product, and reliable safeguards to protect the public and the environment from unsafe products.

The bill clarifies existing law and creates additional law, where necessary, to govern the introduction of genetically-engineered organisms into our world. It provides for research into the basic questions surrounding biotechnology and it relies on existing expertise to coordinate the science and technological approaches the Government will follow.

The bill approaches these goals in several ways. First, it creates a statutory Biotechnology Science Coordinating Committee under the Office of Science and Technology Policy. This committee will serve as a forum to address the scientific problems in assessing and managing the risks associated with biotechnology. It will promote uniformity in developing review procedures in the various agencies that will regulate the release, use and distribution of genetically-engineered products. In addition, this committee will have the authority to develop guidelines for good laboratory and good manufacturing practices in the biotechnology industry.

Second, this bill establishes a Biotechnology Science Research Program to promote cooperative research by the Government and the biotechnology industry. Under this program, the various Federal agencies will join together with private industry to fund basic research on fundamental biological issues that affect biotechnology. The research agenda established by Government and industry under this program will be designed to help close the gap between our ability to create genetically-engineered organisms and our ability to predict the nature of their interaction with the environment.

This Research Program will follow the model of the successful Health Effects Institute, a nonprofit corporation established in 1980 to conduct joint Government-industry sponsored scientific research as a basis for rational regulations under the Clean Air Act. The Biotechnology Science Research Program, like the Health Effects Institute, is intended to avoid the debate between Government and industry about the quality of basic research and data. It will be dedicated to the promotion of quality scientific research conducted under the supervision of a board of governors that is independent of both Government and industry. We anticipate that the Biotechnology Research Program will join the research interests and research dollars of both the public and private sectors under independent supervision and peer review to create a solid factual base for this new science of biotechnology.

For years, the National Toxicology Program has joined the interests and funds of various Federal agencies to further our knowledge about toxic chemicals. This precedent of internal Federal cooperation joined with the precedent of Government-industry cooperation under the Health Effects Institute provides a strong case for the implementation of the research program I am proposing in this bill.

In addition to its research component, this bill provides the framework for the regulation of the products of biotechnology. The bill amends the Toxic Substances Control Act to require EPA review and approval before genetically-engineered organisms can be released, used or distributed in the environment.

Permits will be required for initial use, expanded use, and commercial use of genetically, engineered organisms. This three-tiered system not only allows for risk assessment at different scales of use and under different conditions, but also creates a body of scientific information that will aid in future evaluations and risk assessment, The bill creates a special Biotechnology Advisory Panel within EPA. To review data submitted by applicants and to determine the proper scope and duration of each permit. This strengthening of TSCA is necessary to address the unique hazards posed by organisms which, unlike chemicals, have the capacity to reproduce and spread.

The bill creates within the USDA the same type of permitting system that it creates under TSCA. In this way, the bill draws on USDA's long-standing expertise in regulating whole plants, animals, and veterinary biologicals. USDA's existing authority to monitor and contain the movement and spread of plant pests and noxious weeds and to monitor the use of animal viruses, toxins and serums will be expanded to include biotechnology products as well.

This bill does not affect the existing authority of FDA in regulating biotechnology products nor does it change or lessen EPA's authority to control pesticides under FIFRA.

There is much to do, and it is my hope that this bill will spark discussion and constructive criticism. I welcome your comments and suggestions as well as those of industry, the public and scientists in this field.

PESTICIDE DATA COMPENSATION ISSUES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to deal with a nagging problem in our pesticide regulatory system. With hearings starting Wednesday on the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act [FIFRA], the pesticide regulatory statute, I feel that it is important to get the issue of data compensation on the table.

The first part of the bill deals with the problem of a company seeking to register or to add a new use to an already registered pesticide. FIFRA requires a registration application to be supported by adequate health and safety data on the chemical. The law allows the original applicant for a pesticide registration to control their data and requires subsequent applicants for registrations of that compound to make use of the original data. This requires a subsequent applicant to negotiate with the original registrant and to compensate them for the citing of this data.

This seems fair since this data is expensive to generate and the first developer of a pesticide should be fairly compensated for their effort. However, control of the data is, in effect, control of the market and subsequent registrants have had to pay dearly for use of the original data. These compensation agreements are also very time consuming and use scarce EPA resources to get settlements on a pesticide-by-pesticide basis.

What I am proposing is a fixed formula which would fairly compensate the original registrant without the time, delay, and extreme costs which have marked these settlements in the past. The formula would require the subsequent applicant to pay the cost of the data development, multiplied by the market share of the applicant—a minimum of 5 percent—with an additional factor to compensate the original data submitter for the development of the market.

The second part of the bill deals with the problem of generating additional data which EPA may require of pesticide registrants to support the continuation of a registration. In some cases, there are many registrants using a given chemical and all should share equitably in the cost of developing additional health and safety data. The bill which I introduced would require the registrants to form a task force with each of the participants paying an equal share of the first 25 percent of the data costs, up to a maximum initial contribution of $100,000. The balance of the cost would be divided based on the market share of the registrants, determined by an independent auditor, with a minimum market share of 5 percent assumed.

These are not the front-burner issues which have driven efforts at pesticide reform in recent years. Yet these are important issues which have held up progress on getting the needed health and safety data on pesticides and on providing alternative pesticides for farmers. These are also not new issues. We attempted to deal with them in 1982 when the House last considered FIFRA amendments.

My real hope is that the affected parties, the large pesticide manufacturers and the smaller producers, can get together and work out a solution which both can support. Absent that compromise, I feel compelled to go ahead and seek a solution as outlined below:

H.R. 4440

A bill to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act to provide for a fair and equitable manner of determining data compensation and sharing the costs of developing data required under the Act

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986."

SEC. 2. FORMULA FOR DETERMINING DATA COMPENSATION.

Section 3(c)(1)(D)(ii) of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (7 U.S.C. 136a(c)(1)(D)(ii)) is amended by striking out in the first full sentence "The terms and amount of compensation" and inserting in lieu thereof "The compensation to be provided to the original data submitter for each year during the fifteen-year period described in the preceding sentence, beginning with the year in which an offer of compensation must be made, shall be an amount equal to (I) the market share of the applicant for the year (which shall be a minimum of 5 percent) multiplied by (II) one-fifteenth of the product of 1.15 and the actual cost of the data to the original data submitter. The terms and amount of compensation pursuant to the foregoing formula".

SEC. 3. SHARING OF COSTS OF ADDITIONAL DATA TO SUPPORT EXISTING REGISTRATIONS.

Section 3(c)(2)(B) of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) ADDITIONAL DATA TO SUPPORT EXISTING REGISTRATIONS.—

"(i) If the Administrator determines that additional data are required to maintain in effect an existing registration of a pesticide product (or a category of products) containing a particular ingredient, the Administrator shall notify all existing registrants of the pesticide to which the determination relates and provide a list of such registrants to any interested persons. The notice shall specify the data required, the date by which the data shall be submitted, and the procedure for obtaining rulings by the Administrator on questions concerning the applicability of the notice to various registrants or concerning the nature of the data required to be submitted.

"(ii) Each registrant of such a pesticide product to whom the notice is applicable shall provide evidence within 180 days after receipt of the notification specified in clause (i) of this subparagraph that it is taking the appropriate steps, prescribed by the Administrator to secure the required data. If more than one registrant is subject to the notice, such steps shall include entering into a joint data development arrangement, unless the registrants subject to the notice unanimously agree otherwise. The joint data developers shall furnish to the Administrator the name, address, and telephone number of the person to whom inquiries concerning the arrangement should be addressed. As an initial cost of participation the joint data developers shall divide equally 25 percent of the estimated total cost of producing the required data or each shall pay $100,000, whichever is less. The balance of the cost of producing the data shall be paid by the joint data developers as needed, and shall be shared by each joint data developer on the basis of its United States market participation for the pesticide being tested, based on total pounds of active ingredient equivalent sold or used annually. Each such share shall be at least 5 percent of the balance of the cost. If the share of any participant is increased by virtue of such minimum 5 percent requirement, the balance of the cost to be shared by the other participants shall be reduced proportionately. Each joint data developer's market participation shall be adjusted during the period of the data development so that the most recent sales figures are used to compute each member's market share for the purpose of determining its share of the remaining cost of producing the required data. Each of the joint data developers shall submit adequate evidence of its annual market participation to an independent auditor for each of the years during the period of the joint data development. Such independent auditors shall be chosen by the joint data developers. The auditor's decisions and determinations shall be final and binding on each of the joint data developers. If further data are required by the Administrator under this paragraph, either before or after the additional data that were originally requested have been submitted, the same formula and procedure specified in this paragraph shall apply as if the subsequent request were the initial request for data. Any registrant who shares in the cost of producing the data shall be entitled to receive a copy of the data, and to examine and rely upon data in support of maintenance of such registration.

"(iii) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, if a registrant who is subject to the notice from the Administrator, within the 180-day period prescribed in clause (ii) of this subparagraph, fails to enter into a joint data development arrangement under that clause, or if any of the joint data developers fails to take appropriate steps to secure and submit the required data, the Administrator shall issue a notice of intent to suspend such registrant's registration of the pesticide for which additional data are required. The terms of such joint data development arrangement shall be enforceable in an action brought by any developer in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over all of the defendants or in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and such action shall be governed by the law of the District of Columbia. The Administrator may include in the notice of intent to suspend such provisions as the Administrator deems appropriate concerning the continued sale and use of existing stocks of such pesticide. Any suspension proposed under this subparagraph shall become final and effective at the end of 30 days from receipt by the registrant of the notice of intent to suspend, unless during that time a request for hearing is made by a person adversely affected by the notice, or the registrant has satisfied the Administrator that the registrant has complied fully with the requirements that served as a basis for the notice of intent to suspend. If a hearing is requested, a hearing shall be conducted under section 6(d) of this Act. The only matters for resolution at that hearing shall be whether the Administrator had a valid and reasonable basis for requiring the additional data, whether the registrant has failed to take the action that served as the basis for the notice of intent to suspend the registration of the pesticide product for which additional data is required, and whether the Administrator's determination with respect to the disposition of existing stocks is consistent with this Act. If a hearing is held, a determination shall be made within 75 days after receipt of a request for such hearing, and the decision made after completion of such hearing shall be final. Any registration suspended under this subparagraph shall be reinstated by the Administrator if the Administrator determines that the registrant has complied fully with the requirements that served as a basis for the suspension of the registration.

"(iv) Except as provided in clause (v) of this subparagraph, data submitted pursuant to this subparagraph (before or after the effective date of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986) shall not be considered by the Administrator to support any application for registration, amended registration, reregistration or experimental use permit on behalf of any person other than the joint data developers for a period of 15 years after the data are submitted, unless the applicant has paid compensation to the joint data developers in accordance with paragraph (1)(D) of this subsection. Such compensation shall be divided among the original participants based on the percentage of the overall monetary participation in the joint data development arrangement.

"(v) With respect to any study which has been or is being performed in response to a request for additional data issued under this subparagraph between September 30, 1978, and the date of enactment of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, any person who on such date of enactment is the registrant of a product of the type to which that request applies but who is not already a party to an agreement to share in the cost of performing that study shall be entitled to enter into a joint data development arrangement with any person or group which is performing or has performed that study, under which arrangement such person shall have the rights and duties of a joint data developer as described in clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv) of this subparagraph. Any registrant who wishes to be availed of the rights provided by this clause shall, not later than 120 days after the date of enactment of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, submit an irrevocable offer to enter into such an arrangement to the person or group which is performing or has performed the study.".

NICARAGUAN AID

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the previous speaker from California [Mr. DREIER] for an excellent special order and I think sharing with all of us and the American people his very recent experiences traveling on a fact-finding tour into Nicaragua.

The gentleman asked the other gentleman from California at the very close why it is so important that now we do something about it, that now that the President has asked the American people to call their legislators. Why now? What is the real importance of this package at this time?

I would like to yield to the gentleman from southern California, who has been a real leader in this area.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank my friend for yielding, and I thank my colleague from California for asking the question and letting me participate in this special order.

Let me say why I think it is important that we act at this time, why it is an extremely important vote.

A number of things are happening in the hemisphere right now. One of the most important actions that has taken place, the most relevant action that has taken place in the last year has been the assassination of the Supreme Court justices at the Palace of Justice at the Supreme Court Building in Colombia.

A number of Members may realize that Colombia is in Central America. It is very close to the Panama Canal. There is a connection between our interests, our use of the Panama Canal. Even though we have essentially given away all ownership of that very vital causeway to Panama, our use of the Panama Canal—there is a connection, I am talking about strategic interests now, between what happened at these assassinations and murders that took place at the Palace of Justice in Colombia and what the Sandinistas are doing in Nicaragua and American interests. Let me just very quickly explain it.

When we traced back the weapons that were used to blow the brains out of these Supreme Court Justices by terrorists in Colombia, we found that all the weapons, somehow or another, went back to the Sandinistas, to the Communists in Nicaragua by serial number.

Some of the weapons went back to the North Vietnamese who captured them from the south during the American military operation in Vietnam. Other weapons went back to former guardsmen. These weapons were captured after Samoza was defeated in Nicaragua. But all the weapons at one time or another went through the Sandinistas, and that indicates that they had a very strong hand in these assassinations.

Now, if you look at Colombia and you look at its position with relationship to the Panama Canal, and you look at Nicaragua which lies between us and the Panama Canal, and you look at the enormous military investment that the Soviet Union, Cuba, and Libya are putting into the communist operations in Nicaragua, you understand that they are putting in a tremendous investment, that they have a real interest there that may be something other than simply helping another Communist government get started.

I think that ultimately they want to take over, to over control of that very vital accessway that we use to get our western shipping to the East and our eastern shipping to the West, the Panama Canal.

□ 2245

I think the gentleman's exposition is excellent. I think he has missed one thing when he just says Nicaragua. But when you say Nicaragua and the Panama Canal, and you talk about the military power of the Communists in the region, you are really talking about Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Nicaragua is a very poor country. Nicaragua could not do any of these things, they could not build these massive airfields, they could not build the deep-water ports, they could not extend their power throughout six or seven countries in terrorist fashion in Central and South America, they could not do it without the support of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union is bankrolling the Nicaraguan operation. That is the real danger to all of us here in the United States, as well as to our neighbors and friends in a continent, in a hemisphere that is moving in the democratic direction.

Mr. HUNTER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. If you look at the Soviet history of transferring arms and aid to other countries, you can see that they never do it unless they expect to get something for it. I think, very clearly, the Soviet planners want to have control ultimately of Nicaragua and Colombia, essentially to have a stranglehold on the Panama Canal.

If you look at the history of the Panama Canal, it is kind of shocking to most Americans to realize that a tremendous amount of American tonnage was sunk by just a few German submarines, U-boats then, right outside of the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal is of incredible strategic importance.

Mr. RITTER. Really, the Soviet phrase, The "correlation of forces," if they dominate, militarily dominate Central America, which is a real probability—in fact, it is a possibility right now—if they dominate that region, they really change the "correlation of forces." They really pull us out of the Middle East, they pull us out of Europe, they pull us out of some of the regions where we get our minerals, where we get our oil, where we have allies and friends and trade. I mean they really do a hamstring number on the United States of America.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield on that point, I think it is important to note, when people say, "This poor country, how could they possibly dominate Central America and the shipping lanes, how could they possibly do this?" That at the present time there is a deep-water port being constructed at El Bluff, which is on the eastern shore not too far north of the Panama Canal. This is being built with the use of Bulgarian engineers, Soviet money, a deep-water port to hold the destroyers and the deep-water cargo ships that would bring arms to the area and service a fleet of submarines and destroyers that could control, along with the port in Cuba, the entire Caribbean Sea unless they were confronted by United States Naval Forces.

Also, right across the lake from Managua, on the western shore, is the largest airport being built at the present time south of the Rio Grande River. It is supposed to be an agricultural airport, as reported by the Communist government.

Mr. RITTER. For crop dusters.

Mr. DELAY. For crop dusters. But there is an 11,000-foot runway in place at the present time, with revetments, which are parking pads for fighters and bombers and the Hind-D, the $20 million Hind-D helicopter supplied by the Soviet Union, on the Pacific Coast of Nicaragua.

Why are they doing that for a little, poor country in Central America?

Mr. RITTER. I think the gentleman asks a crucial question, and that then comes to the reason why we need to help those who at this point in time, not 6 months, not 1 year, not 3 years from now, but at this point in time, while they are still building this port, while they are still finishing this airfield, while they are still consolidating their homes, the homes of the people into communism via their block committees, I mean now is the time. Any later and you face this kind of total control that the Jaruzelski regime holds over the Polish people.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield on that, it brings points of the opposition that are amazing to me that say, "Well, we ought to just contain"—containment is a new policy—"them within their borders and let them determine themselves." That would be fine if the Soviets and the Cubans were not there.

Mr. RITTER. Exactly.

Mr. DELAY. Or the PLO or the Libyans or the Red Brigade or many of the other terrorist organizations of the world that are located. In fact, on our trip this weekend we were led around by an embassy official who happened to live across the street from the PLO. Isn't that amazing? There are a lot of claims that the PLO are not there. Isn't it amazing that she lives across the street from the PLO?

Mr. RITTER. The opposition is also saying—largely, they are liberals and liberal Democrats, that is the opposition—that they would never allow the creation of a Soviet-Cuban base right south of our borders, a Soviet-Cuban military base right south of our border. At that point we would have to move. So what the liberals are saying is, "We will use American troops to take care of the situation once that Soviet-Cuban base is there." But it is there now.

Mr. DELAY. It is a total contradiction of what they are accusing us of. If we sent $100 million to the freedom fighters who are fighting for themselves for freedom in this country, if we sent $100 million, what happens next year? Do we send American boys in? In fact, if we take their policy of containment, of saying, "Well, the mighty forces of the United States will stop them from crossing the borders," well, they are saying that their policy is containment, and if they cross that border we send in American troops.

Mr. RITTER. They are saying that their policy of containment means containment by whom? Containment by American troops?

Mr. DELAY. By Costa Rica, who does not have an army?

Mr. RITTER. I mean it is ridiculous. When they talk about quarantine, are they talking blockade? The world was closest to the Third World War at the time of the blockade of Cuba. They are talking about a land blockade, they are talking about potential combat operations between infiltrators coming out of Nicaragua or Nicaraguan forces and American troops.

The irony of this debate is that the lowest risk strategy of all is helping the freedom fighters. Why? Because in the event if they did lose, they would simply have kept the Sandinista Communists on the defensive for all the time they were engaged, and we would still be in a better position several years from now because they would have weakened the Sandinista Communists. That is the lowest risk strategy of all. We have been talking about doing nothing all evening, and that is a very high risk strategy. The other alternative is American troops. What we are proposing is a way to prevent the use of American troops or, really, the lowest risk strategy we could possibly come up with.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

When you mention the freedom fighters, we know that tomorrow during the debate—and we are not talking to the full House now, just the three of us are discussing this issue. But we know that the leaders of the freedom fighters will be cut up. They will be criticized. They will be inadequate in this respect and inadequate in that respect.

A number of Members on the other side of the aisle, particularly the liberal Democrats, have such an opinion of freedom fighters, no matter where in the world that they spring up, that I think it can truly be said that they never met a freedom fighter that they liked. I do not want to go off on a tangent, but they do not like Mr. Savimbi because he has been helped by South Africa. They do not like Mr. Robelo because, although he was a former Sandinista, in fact, was one of the junta, he has men under his command who formerly, some of them, worked for the Guard.

Mr. RITTER. By the way, Alfonso Robelo is a social Democrat. Alfonso Robelo is the former president of the university in Nicaragua, the main university, which was a hotbed of revolt against the Somoza regime. Alfonso Robelo is the kind of human being that the liberal Democrats in this House and in the Senate should embrace with open arms.

Arturo Cruz was part of the system, as well. Arturo Cruz again is a very liberal Democrat. He has chosen to break with the Sandinista Communists.

So you have a social Democrat, a very liberal Democrat, and, basically, a conservative Democrat businessman who was in prison for a month by the Somicistas, and you have a democratic triumverate that is heading up the United Nicaraguan Organization. These are three Democrats; there is no doubt about it.

□ 2255

Now, compare these people for a moment with Tomas Borge, Latin America's chief Stalinist. With Daniel Ortega, a Marxist-Leninist dictator. With Byardo Arce who keeps coming out with statements of how strongly Marxist-Lenisist the Sandinistas are. This is the competition; this is the vote. Do we vote for the Social Democrats and the Liberal Democrats in Nicaragua or do we vote on behalf of the Sandinista Communists because doing nothing gives them the upper hand to solidify their Leninist revolution and to create the Soviet-Cuban base that threatens the hemisphere.

Mr. HUNTER. If the gentleman will yield further, can you imagine Alphonso Robelo killing somebody, having somebody executed because they booed him at a meeting. According to the Human Rights Commission, the widow of a Managua taxicab driver, Nelson Perez was arrested one night for committing the crime, the heinous crime of booing Comman-dante Arce at a taxicab union meeting. He was arrested in 3 hours and shortly thereafter his widow was given the word that unfortunately he had been shot dead while trying to escape. So I am glad you gentleman made the trip, and that you waited for him because you might not be here to vote for us right now.

Can you imagine comparing him to Mr. Robelo. You know, Mr. Robelo could be on the House floor here voting not to cut Social Security. When you say he is a Social Democrat you are absolutely right. Here is a person who has a heart, he is a humanitarian, he believes in democracy, he believes in pluralism; he could be over there with Members of the other side of the aisle working for some fairly liberal programs. He could be with us working on the conservative side of the aisle working for the free enterprise system to try to increase jobs in this country.

That man is a good man. He is a man that is cut out of the same mold I would say as Mr. Duarte of El Salvador.

Mr. RITTER. The difference between the leadership of the Contras or the Democratic forces in Nicaragua and the Communist Sandinistas is like day and night. Yet, we hear the voices constantly that the Contras are a bunch of brigands and thieves. They say that the Contras are a bunch of ex-Somocistas. The fact is that there are more ex-National Guardsmen in the Sandinista military than there are in the Contras. That is the fact, and the fact is that any former member of the National Guard that serves with the Contras has not had any record whatsoever of human rights violations against the Nicaraguan people during the reign of Somoza.

The reverse is not true. The Somocistas, who are some of the hardheads in the previous regime that work and fight and support the Sandinista Communists, those opportunists, have criminal records, and there are a significant number of known criminals actively engaged in the perpetration of the repression by the Sandinistas against the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield, I just wanted to point out to the gentleman, and he is so right, it probably will be said on the floor of this House tomorrow that the Contras are nothing but a bunch of Somocistas that are being led by the Somoza National Guard. They are just Somoza people trying to revive Somoza and bring back the horrible regime of Somoza. Although I think we have established tonight, in fact, I asked this question of the Permanent Human Rights Commission as we sat there in that room, if you had to weigh what is happening today—in fact I want to point out two questions that I asked—the first one was if you had to evaluate what is happening today in regard to human rights violations and atrocities and compare the Sandinistas to Somoza, what would be your comparison?

They would say without a doubt, the Sandinistas are worse than the Somoza regime that was already a terrible regime that brought on the revolution.

The other question that I asked was: Are Somoza people trying to come back into power? They pointed out that only 28 percent of the leadership in the freedom fighter forces is from the Somoza National Guard. Most of those, by the way, are soldiers that were too young to have any ideological affiliation with Somoza. They were in the National Guard; they did what their leaders told them. It is sort of like condemning every German because they are from Germany they have got to be bad Germans.

Mr. RITTER. I think the idea that the Contras are just a bunch of Somocistas is an outright lie. I do not mind saying it, and I saying it with pride. When it is not a lie, it is a red herring. It is a red herring designed to take attention away from the reality of what is happening there today. That reality is so much more brutal because it is so institutionalized; because it is such a part of an international model which we have seen and feared and cried over so many times in the past. It is this inexorable establishment of a Soviet client state so close to the Texas border that we are seeing taking place today.

When they talk about Somocistas and the Contra forces it is a bunch of baloney. The reality is that the great majority of that some-20,000 strong force, the great majority are peasants. They are peasants who are believers in God and cannot put up with the ideological constraint and the economic constraint and the human rights constraint that their lives are put under so they are willing, without boots, without decent arms, without decent supplies to go out into the field and join up with the Contra forces.

Mr. DELAY. It is interesting that the gentleman brings that up because I have found a documentary shot by a German that, by the way, has been shown in West Germany and has been bought by NBC Television who chooses not to show it in its entirety, although it is using it as a file film to pick out the bad parts of this documentary to show the incompetence of the freedom fighter force.

I have this documentary that follows the Contras from their training camps in December, this last December this was made, follows the Contras from their training camps in Honduras into Nicaragua. They stage an ambush and come back out of Nicaragua. It points out many, many things.

No. 1, most of the people in this freedom fighter force that is in the documentary are from the ages of 12 years old to 21 I believe it is. They are country people, compesinos, which are from the country. They are fleeing the Sandinista Army. They are either deserters from the Communist army or they are fleeing conscription from the Sandinista Army and joining and volunteering as freedom fighters. They are ill-equipped but still fighting, even though in the documentary it shows that in this force of 300 they could only send 56 because that is all they could outfit.

Mr. RITTER. What is even more ironic is the liberals and the liberal Democrats who are so opposed to helping the Contras, are saying that the Contras cannot do the job; they are not competent. They are not competent; they are ragtag. But they cut off the assistance to these poor compesinos. So while the Sandinista Communists are being armed by the Soviet Union, a superpower, this Congress, cut off those fighting against the Sandinista Communists and left a very, very uneven battle.

What we are asking for is to just even up that battle a little bit so that the forces fighting for pluralism and democracy and really the safety of our hemisphere are not totally outgunned by those forces fighting established communism, a Soviet base right south of the Texas border threatening this hemisphere.

□ 2305

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to claim it for my own, but I heard a very interesting commentary on this ragtag analysis that some liberal Democrats have made to the effect that, well, these are ragtag troops, so we should not help them. That analysis was made, or that commentary, was made by the gentleman from Georgia, NEWT GINGRICH. I think it is very appropriate in this situation.

He said that it is a good thing the French did not visit George Washington at Valley Forge and make the same analysis, because they would have come away with the idea that here were a bunch of undisciplined ragtag people, many of whom did not even have boots for their feet, as the freedom fighters do not have boots for their feet today, and very possibly they could have gone back to France and said, "Listen, these Americans don't have a chance. They are fighting this disciplined military and they are going to come out of Valley Forge and they are going to lose."

Mr. RITTER. But the French did come through for us. Are we going to come through in our era for comparable people who are fighting or fighting to regain their country from communism?

I have heard the argument, by the way, in fact I was on the floor the other night when a Member of the other party was saying, I mentioned the Afghan freedom fighters, and he said, "Well, you can't compare the Afghan freedom fighters with the Nicaraguan freedom fighters."

Why not? Both of them are fighting to regain their country from puppet governments armed to the teeth by the Soviet Union. The difference is that the Soviets have invaded Afghanistan. They have not invaded per se Nicaragua, but there are 3,000 Cuban military there and 8,000 other Cubans in a variety of tasks. We saw how well those construction workers fought in the battle of Granada.

I mean, you have got Lybians and Bulgarians and North Vietnamese and North Koreans. Jeane Kirkpatrick calls it the Soviet international fighting force. That is somewhat of an invasion in itself, but the real comparability between Afghanistan and Nicaragua is they are both trying to rid their countries of an alien ideology which represses their people and destroys their country.

Communism, that is the bottom line. Frankly, and I am very familiar with the struggle going on in Afghanistan, frankly the perception of the Nicaraguan democratic forces about things like democarcy and pluralism and economic freedom and freedom of the press is far, far more sophisticated than the tribes people in Afghanistan who are simply fighting to get rid of the Soviets.

So, yes, you can compare them. You can compare them very well. As a matter of fact, if all one is interested is whether or not those forces fighting for freedom and fighting against communism have democratic leanings, indeed the forces fighting against the Sandinista Communists in Nicaragua are much more sophisticated democrats then the forces in Afghanistan.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will my friend yield?

Mr. RITTER. Yes. I want to thank the gentleman for his consistent leadership in this area, for spending his time and giving his effort for a cause which I know he believes very firmly in and he has been a part of this debate from day one and really a great contributor to it.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, I thank my friend. I know we both just hope, or all three of us hope, who are still in this Chamber, that there are some people listening and that there will be people listening to the full debate tomorrow.

Let me just make one other observation about the Founding Fathers. You know, the President took a lot of flak from the Congress when he compared Mr. Rubelo and the other freedom fighter leaders, the other Contra leaders, to the Founding Fathers; but you know, one thing that occurred to me was to have not shown a lot of class that is similar or equivalent to that shown by the Founding Fathers in this Congress.

I wonder what the Founding Fathers would have said about the attitude that we have right now when the French came all the way across the ocean to help us achieve our freedom and we are not willing to sent equipment to people in our own hemisphere.

Mr. RITTER. I think the gentleman makes a really excellent point.

Mr. HUNTER. I wonder particularly what President Monroe would have said. Here was a President who promulgated the Monroe Doctrine, and you know the funny thing about it, is the Monroe Doctrine was aimed at European powers, and one of those European powers aimed at keeping out of our hemisphere——

Mr. RITTER. Was Russia.

Mr. HUNTER. Was Russia, was the Soviet Union, and if President Monroe could see this Congress sitting around on its hands while they build a Soviet naval base between us and the Panama Canal, I do not think he would have had any statements about this Congress and particularly the liberal Democrats that equated them with the Founding Fathers.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman would yield back, I think President Monroe is turning over in his grave right now as he sees the Monroe Doctrine being replaced by the Brezhnev doctrine and those who would keep the freedom fighters from undermining the Brezhnev doctrine are in this very House of Representatives.

What we are trying to do is reverse the Communist tide in Nicaragua and those who vote against assisting the democratic forces are essentially voting for, not directly, but indirectly voting to preserve the Brezhnev doctrine.

By the way, Monroe is not the only American President who is probably turning over in his grave. I think there are several others. I think Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who for many, many years, while there was an isolationist Congress and an isolationist America, was working covertly to assist our allies in Europe to stand up to the Nazi threat.

I think there is another President who is probably turning over in his grave. His name is Harry Truman, who performed admirably against this same kind of opposition when the Communists were going to take Greece, the Soviet proxies were going to take Greece with Soviet arms, and Harry Truman intervened to preserve independence for Greece and Greece turned into a democracy. At the time Greece was a monarchy.

I might add, George McGovern was a severe critic of Harry Truman, claiming that the Greek monarchy was old and decrepit and not worth saving. Had it been for the McGovernite philosophy which we see so prevalent here with the Democratic Party in this Congress, Greece would be Communist today. The Soviet Union would be all over Greece as a Soviet satellite. The whole situation in Western Europe could be different. The whole situation in the Mediterranean could have been different; so I think he is having some real problems.

I think there is one other President. I think John F. Kennedy would be appalled to see the behavior of his colleague Democratic Party Members on an issue such as this. I think John F. Kennedy said it very well on numerous occasions that we are in a long twilight struggle and to give up this struggle when all it takes is the reallocation of $100 million, which is a lot of money, but it still in terms of the overall defense budget is small and equivalent to some six fighter planes, if he would have seen this happen, I think he would have been appalled.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one last statement?

Mr. RITTER. Yes.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

You know, not only would Presidents turn over in their graves if they could see the action this Congress has taken, but there are also probably former Members of Congress who would turn over in their graves. It was pointed out to me by a Member of Congress who served with him that Sam Rayburn had a saying about foreign policy. Sam Rayburn, the great Democratic leader, he had a lot of trust in the guy who occupied that office down on Pennsylvania Avenue, the guy who was elected by everybody, the President of the United States when it came to foreign policy. I think Sam's trust, institutional trust, if you will, in that guy's judgment has been borne out by what has happened with the Soviets and other Communists who have dealt with him in recent times. It is very clear now that the Soviets do not like Ronald Reagan, but they respect him and they respect his strength. He is the one leader in this country who was elected by everybody and the great line that Sam Rayburn gave when he talked about the prerogative of foreign policy and doing what the President asked with regard to foreign policy was capsuled in these few words, "Politics stops at the water's edge."

I would like to repeat that statement for everyone of these would-be Secretaries of State who sit over here on the liberal Democratic side and would second-guess the President of the United States.

□ 2315

They have done incredibly foolish things in the last year. For example, they set up this organization, a brand new organization, to dispense this humanitarian aid to the Contras. They did not want it to go through the dreaded CIA or through the DOD. Now they are mad because a GAO report came out and said that these State Department people who they designated must distribute this aid, these people in three-piece suits did not follow these bandages down through the jungles and the swamps of Central America to be sure that they were ultimately delivered to the people in the field. Well of course they did not. They set up a structure through their own stupidity that led ultimately to failure.

Mr. RITTER. I think this is such an important point. They set up conditions, that is the liberals in the House have set up conditions which are bound to fail, conditions on the President's policies, and once they fail, they blame the President.

Now what we are trying to do here is set up some conditions that have a chance of success.

I would like to thank the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Texas. I wanted to present the reason that I was taking this special order which was to present a New Republic article to the people and to the House. It is called "The Case for the Contras." I would like to present this New Republic article of March 24, 1986.

As you know or may not know, the New Republic basically takes positions of the liberal wing, but in recent years in foreign policy, it has diverged from that McGovernite wing of the Democratic Party because it feels they are just making a lot of mistakes and are wrong. The New Republic has a great deal of respect within the Democratic circles. They are basically on these issues: Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Hubert Humphrey, John F. Kennedy, Democrats, and I would like to just read and then comment a little bit on this article in the New Republic entitled "The Case for the Contras":

The upcoming vote in Congress on military aid to the Nicaraguan contras is one of the most important foreign policy votes of the decade. The future of Central America hinges on its outcome.

The position of the contras in precarious. They certainly have people: anywhere from 14,000 to 20,000, depending on whom you believe. That represents about twice the number of guerrillas in El Salvador, a country with about twice the population of Nicaragua. And about three times the number of Sandinista troops at the time of the overthrow of Somoza.

They also have people on the home front. Not even the most anti-contra-aid congressman denies that the Sandinistas have become extremely unpopular. Among those strongly opposed to Sandinista rule is the Church, the most popular institution in Nicaraguan society. The pope's divisions are not the only disaffected. These now include ordinary people deprived of the necessities of life in a wrecked economy; the business and middle classes, which have been denied the promises of freedom; and many intellectuals, some in exile, who don't relish life as funtionaries of the state. The contras, a peasant army, themselves represent the deep resentment in the countryside at Sandinista offenses to tradition and religion. Add to that the general uprising of the Miskitos against Sandinista colonialism, and you have a vast popular opposition. These are the people whose hopes would be betrayed by the liquidation of the armed resistance and the consolidation of Sandinista rule, which will be the inevitable result of American denial of military aid to the contras.

I want to add here that this article is taken from one of the leading lights in the Democratic viewpoint, but the classical Democratic viewpoint, again the J.F.K., Harry Truman, Franklin Roosevelt Democratic viewpoint.

The article goes on:

But if they are so many, why haven't they already won? For the same reason Solidarity, ten million stong, lost in Poland. Under Leninist regimes, Philippine-style "people power" does not do terribly well. Nor do vastly outgunned, out-trained guerrilla armies do well against Cuban-Soviet-style military machines.

The Soviets have poured something on the order of $500 million in arms into Nicaragua in the last five years.

If you are talking about training and facilities, you are talking about a $1.4 billion figure.

Since 1984 the U.S. has been prevented from sending the contras a penny's worth of arms. The recent delivery of helicopter gunships to the Sandinistas, reportedly piloted in combat by Cubans, has been decisive.

I might add that they have documentation to show definitively that the Cubans are piloting MI-24 helicopter gunships.

It has made it extremely difficult for the contras to move and to resupply. In the absence of antiaircraft weaponry, they are quite defenseless.

As a result, contra advances and successes in the past several years are being reversed.

Now I want to add that the other side claims that the reason the contras are doing badly is they are facing a Soviet Cuban armed and trained massive military machine, and we pulled the rug out from under them. The fact is that in June of 1984, this Congress denied any further assistance to the Contras. For an 18-month period, the Contras went downhill, lost their position within the country. And what happened to negotiations at that point? Negotiations were tried on numerous occasions and what happened? The Sandinistas continually stonewalled. With no Contras in the field, with no American assistance, that is equivalent to the kind of thing that the liberals want to do now. They want to take the Contras out, give them no assistance, and eventually they expect negotiations to take place.

We had 16 months of experience and dozens and dozens of times that we sought to negotiate with the Sandinistas. They would negotiate on the security, on the security factors, taking their troops out of combat and taking their resupply out of El Salvador, ceasing the supply of arms and ammunition to Central and Latin American countries and they said that they would do that. But they never, they never talked about, they never allowed us to talk about internal changes to fulfill the promise of the original revolution, to fulfill promises to the Organization of American States. They never once allowed that and, of course, there is no realiability with the Soviet-Cuban Communists style government without those kinds of internal changes. So they can like turn off their military operations like a hot water faucet, but they can also turn them back on again, they being who they are.

I return to the New Republic article:

In the last six months, particularly since the introduction of the MI-24 gunships, all but between 3,000 and 6,000 contras have been driven from Nicaragua. The rest are in Honduran camps waiting for arms. In civil wars numbers alone can't determine the outcome, particularly if one's side is barely armed.

And also barely trained. Again out of congressional scrupulousness, the U.S. military has been prohibted from training and professionalizing the contra forces, as it has done in El Salvador with a resulting marked improvement in the country's human rights record. It is somewhat paradoxical to argue that we shouldn't be training the contras because they are so undisciplined when one of the major reasons this peasant army remains undisciplined is that the U.S. military is prohibited from training it.

Thus the upcoming vote will be critical. Without military aid, the contras will fight and bleed perhaps for some time longer, but without hope. First to wither will be the armed resistance, overcome by vastly superior Soviet-supplied firepower. Then, just as certainly, the unarmed resistance, demoralized and abandoned, will follow, leaving the Sandinistas in total, permanent control of Nicaragua.

Again, by the way, one of the things that we did not discuss tonight is what happens when these kinds of Communist regimes take hold. They inevitably produce people who not being able to vote with their voice and with their ballot, vote with their feet. They inevitably produce streams of refugees. One can project millions of refugees coming out of the communization of Nicaragua and potentially Central America.

Let me go on to say, so what is so bad about the Sandinistas in total control of Nicaragua? What, after all, does the resistance hope to achieve?

Sandinista Defense Minister Humberto Ortega explained it well, when in 1981 he denounced former Sandinista junta member Alfonso Robelo as an enemy of the revolution. "The democracy that Robelo asks," charged Ortega, "is * * * that they [the bourgeoisie, presumably] have the army, the power, and that we Sandinistas be what the left is in Costa Rica, a sector, an organization that is free to move about, that publishes its newspaper." In other words, Robelo wants, for Nicaragua, Costa Rican-style democracy where all political tendencies, including the left, are free to compete for (rotating) power. For Humberto Ortega, such a program amounts to political criminality. It is what made the Sandinistas push Robelo out of the junta, crush his party, and drive him to exile and resistance. Robelo is now one of the three leaders of the Contra political leadership, the United Nicaraguan Opposition, known as UNO.

The United Nicaraguan Opposition, as we mentioned before, is composed of democrats, "democrats" with a small d.

What is at stake in this civil war is any hope for a democratic Nicaragua. The end of the contras means the end of that hope. And a ban on military aid will likely mean, sooner or later, the end of the contras.

Here is where the New Republic takes it right to the House Democrats. They say:

One would think that House Democrats, who for years have been urging, pushing, encouraging, threatening, and finally celebrating the return of democracy in the Philippines, would be equally eager to see democracy returned to Nicaragua. But they are not. Why? They put up a case that we find, for an issue of this gravity, stunningly weak.

By what right does the U.S. try to bring democracy to a place where it enforced dictatorship for so long? This is the "because of our tainted history we have no moral standing" argument. It is mystifying. The United States stood by the dictatorship in Haiti for at least three decades. Does that mean that we should therefore have ruled ourselves morally ineligible to assist in the transition to democracy? The United States ruled the Philippines as a colony for nearly five decades, then stood by a dictator for the last two. Does that mean that the United States should have disqualified itself from aiding the restoration of democracy?

Certainly the U.S. has a very blemished history in Nicaragua. It is equally certain that our aims now are different then they were 60, even 20, years ago. As in Guatemala and El Salvador, as in the Philippines and Haiti and other places where our history is stained, in Nicaragua the relevant question is American intentions today, not Teddy Roosevelt's at the time of the building of the Panama Canal.

We have no right to try to impose democracy on another country. After the Philippines and Haiti, and the general selfcongratulatory jubilation of liberals and conservatives alike over two truimphs of American diplomacy, this argument stands exposed as a camouflage. Those who advocate dramatic American intervention in pro-American dictatorships should not be suddenly sticken with scrupulousness about the sanctity of sovereignty when intervention is proposed in states ruled by pro-Soviet Leninists.

But one situation involves peaceful change; the other, war.

Here, I add, is a most important point of this discussion. Because it goes to the heart of those who would wish to see a peaceful solution. We all wish to see a peaceful solution.

The New Republic goes on to say:

But that option does not exist. That is, peaceful change in one situation—the Philippines—war in Nicaragua.

But that option does not exist. Does anyone believe that the Sandinistas will ever peacefully transfer power or permit a free allocation of power by election?

The contras can't win. This argument is invariably heard from those who vote again and again to cut off aid to the contras. Yes, unarmed they can't win. Maybe House Democrats expect Nicaragua democrats to win by lying down in front of Sandinista tanks, Philippines style.

Can the contras win the way the North Vietnamese won in South Vietnam? No, but they can win in the way the Sandinistas won in Managua. They could win not by rolling over the Sandinista army, but by controlling the countryside, which would in turn help undermine what little urban support the Sandinistas have. A Leninsit regime with a conscript army on the defensive, losing the countryside and undermined in the city, would ultimately find its situation untenable.

I might add something else. We are informed that $100 million supplied to the Contra forces could indeed make a substantial difference.

We are led to believe that sufficient amounts of antiaircraft, heat-seeking, backpack-type missiles, portable equipment, could effectively neutralize the helicopter gunships and the other troop-carrying helicopters and combat helicopters that form the center of the Nicaraguan capability against the Contras; and that would cost just several million dollars.

The argument is also made that, whatever we give, the Soviets will give more. We are led to believe that the Communist army in Nicaragua is so saturated with Soviet arms that there is no more room left for additional Soviet hardware.

So in the sense, their glass is overflowing; the Communist glass is overflowing, and our glass is totally empty. That is what we are trying to change.

The contras are not democrats but Somocistas. It is true that some top commanders are ex-Guardia. But even the most conserative (and powerful) of the three political leaders, Adolfo Calero, was a longtime opponent of Somoza and jailed for his efforts. The other UNO leader, Arturo Cruz, an impeccable democrat, says the contras represent "the revolt of Nicaraguas against oppression by other Nicaraguans." One doesn't raise an army of 15,000 peasants with promises of restoring a universally despised dictatorship.

I might add, just going back for a moment, we understand that there are more ex-Somoza national guard working with the Sandinista Government than there are with the Contras, and some of those have criminal records; whereas those with the Contras have no criminal records.There are Somocistas on both sides. Some now are working for the forces of freedom and some are working for the forces of communism.

There should be a difference.

We should try diplomacy, not force. The United States should be working out with the Sandinistas some kind of diplomatic arrangement under the umbrella of Contadora goes the argument. This imagined solution according to the New Republic, to Sandinista regional power and ambitions is a parchment barrier: the Sandinistas are given free rein within their borders, and in return, they promise not to trespass on anyone else's. Certainly we can expect the Sandinistas to adhere initially to such a nonagression or revolution-with-frontiers agreement. Time enough for the contras to wither away and be repatriated in Miami. At which point the Sandinistas will be secure in the knowledge that no future opponents are ever going to risk their lives in a second insurgency, having seen the first one sold out. With a free hand, does anyone imagine that they will adhere to their agreements any more than, say, the Vietnamese adhered to theirs? We have experience with Sandinista parchment. In 1979 they pledged to the Organization of American States to establish an open, democratic, and pluralistic society.

I might add, we tried diplomacy during that 16-month period between the cutoff of American aid and the rejuvenation of a program involving humanitarian assistance; we tried.

□ 2335

We tried. We failed miserably. It takes willful blindness to imagine that some kind of paper agreement with the Sandinistas that allows them to consolidate their power will ensure stability in Central America. I feel that is quite a good term to characterize what we are facing here, that the New Republic uses, the term "willful blindness." In fact the opposite is almost certainly the case. A highly militarized, highly disciplined country with by far the largest army in Central America, with ideological ambition stretching far beyond its borders, stated as we know I might add by their leaders themselves, and supported by Cuba and the Soviet Union, is bound to be a source of constant instability in a region of weak and fledgling democracies.

In italics again:

The neighboring countries seem to want a Contadora solution.

The New Republic goes on:

What does one expect from say Costa Rica, a country with no army, facing a 50,000-man military across its border? It sees a starved insurgency, an isolationist U.S. Congress, and a rising military power in Managua. Does one expect Costa Rica publicly to come out in support of overthrowing its neighbor given the odds, now that its neighbor will be in power permanently? Of course such countries will make muted public statements. But as many leaders of these democracies told the Kissinger Commission and others since, they are desperate to see the United States get rid of the Sandinistas for them.

I was in Nicaragua in July, I was in Honduras last July as well, in El Salvador, in the countries of the region. That is what we heard from the leaders as they took us aside in very private comments, very private statements. We heard those voices saying: "Whatever you do make it firm, make it consistent, make it fast."

The New Republic goes on:

What is the government of Colombia, one of the original Contadora countries, to say? It publicly denies but privately knows that an assault on its Palace of Justice and the massacre of its Supreme Court was carried out by M-19 guerrillas with weapons of Nicaraguan origin. It knows that Sandinista comandante Thomas Borges attended a mass, complete with an M-19 draped over the altar, for the guerrillas killed in that raid. The reach of the Sandinistas is impressive. Latin American governments, many of which face left-wing insurgencies, are hardly likely to make themselves more of a target by public calls for the Yankees to save them from communists.

Our record there in the words of Alfonso Robelo, one of the leaders of UNO, the democratic resistance, is one of a yo-yo. He calls our policy a yo-yo policy, up one day, down the next.

The contra policy

Again this is in italics—

The contra policy is driving the Sandinistas into the hands of the Soviets. It is hard—for Americans to believe that some people act out of ideological conviction. Look, therefore, at what the Sandinistas did long before there was a Reagan, long before there were contras. In one year the Carter administration gave them in aid the equivalent of half of what Somoza received in 16 years, and during that time they systematically eliminated their democratic allies and aligned themselves with the Soviets.

The New Republic goes on—

On June 23, 1981, Humberto Ortega said to the Sandinista army and militia officers: "We are saying that Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our Vanguard for understanding [the revolution's] historic process and for carrying out the revolution. . . ." He then asserted that the FSLN had made the pact with the moderate opposition only for the purposes of getting rid of Somoza, holding off U.S. intervention, and keeping the economy in place.

The New Republic goes on, pointing directly at Democrats in the House of Representatives. It says:

It is remarkable that for House Democrats Sandinista ideological commitment requires constant theatrical demonstration. It took Daniel Ortega's flight to Moscow a few days after a contra vote last year to dramatize Managua's connection with Moscow. You can be sure that this time Ortega's handlers will take away his American Express card until after the vote. Don't expect to see him visiting New York for eye wear or Moscow for hardware until the coast is clear.

I might add, however, that the Sandinista Communists have erred a little bit in this direction. Not long ago at the Communist Party conference in Moscow, the leadoff foreign dignitary speaker was a Sandinista Communist. So perhaps our Democratic friends will give that the same kind of consideration they gave Ortega's illtimed trip to Moscow last year.

Again in italics:

The argument goes: The Cubans and Soviets will match our escalation.

This, the New Republic goes on to say, is the counsel of pure defeatism.

It cedes to the Soviets the power to set the level of violence and superpower commitment on the North American continent. It is, in effect, to say that the Soviet will to annex Nicaragua exceeds that of the United States to prevent it from happening.

NICARAGUAN AID

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DELAY. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I yield to the gentleman to finish his remarks.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his courtesy.

I want to repeat that last one, because we hear it so often here in the House. If we do something, the Cubans and Soviets will match it. The New Republic says:

This is the counsel of pure defeatism. It cedes to the Soviets the power to set the level of violence and superpower commitment on the North American continent. It is in effect to say that the Soviet will to annex Nicaragua exceeds that of the United States to prevent it from happening. The prophecy is of course self-fulfilling.

As I mentioned before, the Sandinista Communist Army is full to the brim with Soviet hardware and advisers. The Contras are struggling to get the kind of material, equipment, and arms they need to stay in the field. Their glass is overflowing. Ours is empty. In italics again:

The Contras will draw the United States into war.

The New Republic states:

Probably the root argument, certainly the one on which TIP O'NEILL hangs his hat, its origin is the fear of another Vietnam and the isolationist hope that if we only will stay out of this fight no harm will come to us.

The New Republic states:

But nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive highly militarized pro-Soviet regime in the area. The Contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army. Of course, American military involvement can never be ruled out. But destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguans hardly seems the way to prevent it. Let me just finish up this quickly. This is really the most crucial argument for the American people because I think most parents, most young people, most everbody is concerned about conflict so close to home. I am sure that is one of the great reasons we are having trouble providing the proper argument and the proper rationale for making some commitment to the freedom fighters.

□ 2345

The New Republic states.

Destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguan Communists—I add the word "Communists"—hardly seems the way to prevent it.

And what will be more likely to bring about American military involvement? Even Democrats argue that the United States has a vital interest in preventing the establishment of a Soviet base in Nicaragua. Even Democrats would call for American military action in that situation Walter Mondale, for example, suggested a quarantine. When tried in October 1962, that idea brought us closer to World War III than any other moment in postwar history. A democratic Nicaragua is the only guarantee that the threat will not materialize.

The consolidation of the Sandinistas will lead to a second Cuba on the mainland, or more precisely, to an enlarged first Cuba. As Robelo recalls, during his days in the ruling junta no important decision was ever made without the assent of the Cuban invariably present at the meeting. Even those who think it sentimental for the United States to concern itself with the state of pluralism and democracy in other countries must recognize what a strategic defeat the establishment of a Soviet satellite in Central America would constitute for the United States.

We do not have any illusions about the tragedy that is civil war and the suffering it causes. Guerrilla war is of necessity nasty, brutish, and long. And this peasant army, ill-trained and ill-equipped, is hardly a perfect model for insurgency. But our choice is this model—which could be vastly improved in combat effectiveness and discipline if given sufficient American aid and training—or none.

They are saying that our choice is either the Contras or nothing at all.

We believe that preventing the establishment of a Leninist dictatorship in Nicaragua is a goal worthy of American support, and that those willing to fight for this cause are deserving of American assistance. A decision to support one side in a civil war is not one to be taken lightly. We come to it in the full realization that, whatever tragedy it brings, the liquidation of the democratic side of Nicaraguan civil war will bring infinitely more tragedy to Nicaragua, to Central America, and ultimately to the rest of the hemisphere.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding to me.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. The article the gentleman read comes straight to the point and to the heart of the issue.

Mr. Speaker, what I would like to do is very briefly finish the trip that we took this weekend that was started by the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

After we left Cardinal Obando y Bravo, we went and had dinner with several individuals, many what would have been businessmen, were businessmen at one time, lawyers, what could be called the chamber of commerce of Managua such as it is.

I personally talked to two leaders of two different labor unions. By the way, these labor unions were affiliated with the AFL-CIO here in the United States. We talked to people who used to own businesses, who still own businesses, such as it is, people who have had their property and farms and ranches confiscated at gunpoint. I would like to give you a little bit of what they said about how commerce works in Managua.

I will take the labor unions first. I asked the labor union leaders how conditions are, and they immediately told me that, first off, the Sandinistas have their own labor union. And to get jobs or to have the union place its members in what is left of businesses in Managua, it is very difficult because the labor unions there are in direct competition with the Communist Party's, the Sandinistas' labor union, and the Sandinistas seem to harass the present labor unions because they control the ration cards. People in Nicaragua cannot buy food without food ration cards. And if you do not belong to the labor union or you are not sympathetic with the Sandinistas and the Sandinista labor union, you do not food ration cards to buy food.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. DELAY. I yield.

Mr. RITTER. I think it is a very interesting point the gentleman makes, that the Sandinistas have brought rationing to Nicaragua. They have never had rationing.

But what happens is some of the liberals are arguing that this is because of the Contras. Now it is really convoluted.

But I would just like to point out that I was a visitor in Cuba, and this is nearly 30 years after the Cuban revolution, and to this day Cuba has ration cards. The Cuban people have to go to the store with ration cards, and there is very, very little on the shelves.

Communism produces rationing because it destroys agriculture, because it destroys the economy.

I just wanted to make that point just in case some of our listeners thought that, well, it is the Contras that are somehow bringing about rationing. Communism brings upon itself economic failure and agricultural demise.

Mr. DELAY. That is a very good point, and I thank the gentleman for making it.

Not only do they have ration cards, I might point out, but they also have ration cards for other things. For instance, these labor unions that still work in some instances in some places have ration cards to buy work clothes. Of course, if you are not sympathetic with the Government or sympathetic with the Sandinistas labor union, you do not get ration cards to buy boots. work boots, gloves, overalls in order to work, which I thought was pretty horrendous in itself.

But I also got to talk to a member, a rank-and-file member, they brought along with them to point out the conditions in the prisons. I might point out that everywhere we went, we encountered people who were in the Communist prisons, and their stories did not vary one iota as to what the prisons were, what the conditions were, and we have already pointed out what the prisons are in Nicaragua.

Going on, I asked the labor union leaders, "How in the world do you keep your members working."

He said, "It is very difficult, but we are still able to keep some businessmen loyal to their unions and keep them working." They did not know how much longer they could last, because they lose their union contracts from company to company.

Now you say, well, there are people who still own companies. Yes, that is true. I talked to a gentleman who made flour and cooking oil in Nicaragua. I asked him, being a businessman myself, I asked him how he ran his business. He said, "It is not very easy. I don't buy anything. The Government buys the wheat for me. They buy it from Eastern bloc countries, from South America, for me. They give it to me, and I depend on them for my resources and raw materials."

I said, "Do you make a profit?

He said, "Only if the Government gives it to me. They set the prices that I charge, even though, quite frankly, it isn't very difficult to get new prices in 2 to 3 weeks. I can go before a committee to get my prices raised if I have to."

□ 2355

Of course, I told him that that is better than in the United States, when the utility company wants to raise its rates it takes 3 to 6 months. But it is such a small company it does not take much to appear before their committees to get their prices raised.

So he is really not in control because he does not even control the salaries in that country. There are 28 levels of salaries in the country. The lowest paid level is 600 cordoba a month. Now, the exchange rate in the hotel was $1 to 900 cordoba. The black market, I am told, is $1 to 1,700, up to 2,000 cordoba. So the lowest salary in Nicaragua is 600 cordoba, which amounts to less than a dollar a month. The highest paid individual in Nicaragua makes 87,000 cordoba a month, and, depending on the exchange rate, that is anywhere from $51 to $87 per month.

All this is set by the government and controlled by the government. If you are lucky enough to run your own business it means all you do is you go through the motions of running a business because the government has control of your business if it does not own the business itself.

A terrible situation. I am sitting there at a dinner table, with a grandfather, who has had his farm confiscated at gun point, everything he owned except the house he was in has been confiscated. Also, he was able to hide some cash that he is now living on. This man, after we talked all evening over dinner, and we were ready to leave, he looks at me with a tear in his eyes and he begs of me, "Mr. Congressman from the United States, that wonderful country of freedom, please, for the sake of my grandchildren, please, please support freedom and democracy for Nicaragua."

At the same dinner table is a lawyer. This lawyer has not been able to practice law since the revolution. I asked him, "How do you make a living?" He said, "My friends support me." He is fighting for freedom, still living in Managua, under the threat of death.

Next door he had a small empty lot, next door to his house, and he built a quonset hut on this small lot, and he put a sign up. In Spanish, the sign meant "Meetings for Democracy." He was immediately thrown into prison for 6 days, beaten and thrown into prison for 6 days. They told him to take down the sign. He refused to do so until they threatened his family. They let him go, telling him to take down the sign. He refused to do so. They threw him back into prison. They threatened and beat him again, and he gave in and told them that he would paint the sign. They gave in, and he went home. He painted the sign in water-based paint, hoping—these are his words—that the rain would wash away the paint. He said, "Unfortunately, the rain has not washed away the paint, but my friends know what is behind the paint."

This is incredible, what is happening in a country a little over 2,000 miles from my district in Texas. It is incredible when people say, "Well, we need to negotiate, we need to give the Sandinistas an opportunity to negotiate," notwithstanding the fact that they have been in control for almost 7 years, have negotiated until we have all turned blue in the face, and they have yet to sign an agreement. How much longer do we have to negotiate?

Now, there is an alternative floating around, saying, "Well, we have got to compromise. We are going to vote the aid and put it in escrow for 6 months, and that will make the Sandinistas negotiate and sign an agreement."

Well, the reason that I am here tonight telling about my trip is to point out that we went to the paper La Prensa—they are putting out a paper at the risk of their lives. The people at La Prensa told us about being kidnaped and beaten. They are afraid for their lives, but they are there, fighting for freedom. We went to the Human Rights Commission and we asked the question, "Why are you continuing to do this? Aren't you in fear for your lives?" They told us that their employees had been beaten, kidnaped, exiled. They are under threat of their lives.

We went to see Cardinal Obando y Bravo. He, as was pointed out earlier, and his priests have been beaten and oppressed and are in fear for their lives.

I just told you the stories about the businessmen, the labor leaders, and I might throw in also the party leaders of the other political parties in the country that are still speaking out, in fear of their lives.

I might, parenthetically, point out to these people who say, "Well, why don't we break off relations and declare war?" the only means by which these people can continue to speak out and speak to us is that they can do it through the Ambassador and through the mission in Nicaragua. We have got to keep that mission there as long as we can so we can continue to speak to these people and continue to give them hope that we will, hopefully, some day come to their aid.

The point here is that these people are still grasping and dreaming and hoping for freedom. They know that if we do not help them that all is lost. And I had a great sense of a small glimmer of hope left in Nicaragua, despite the military buildup of the Soviets, despite the Cubans being there, and despite the fact that the Libyans are there, the PLO are there, and Red Guard is there, all of these terrorist groups are coming into Nicaragua, despite all this, I feel there is still a hope there. And if we put that money in escrow and wait 6 months, another 6 months added onto the 7 years, waiting for the Sandinistas to negotiate, we play right into their hands because they know that in the next 6 months to a year they will have built a military machine in Nicaragua so massive that they will be at the threshold of no return that is so evident across this world, that there is a massive military machine that can keep the people from rising up and throwing off this government. If you have the Soviet machine and the Cuban machine in there, there is no way that these people will have the opportunity to throw off the Communist government in Nicaragua. If they cannot do that, along with all of the other arguments about the revolution without boundaries that President Daniel Ortega talks about, we are in trouble in this country, our security is threatened, and all of the other arguments come together. We cannot put this off. We cannot compromise. $100 million is only a beginning for freedom in this area, and we must fight for freedom in Nicaragua and we must help people who are hoping that we will come to their aid and bring freedom and democracy to Nicaragua.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELAY. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for his eloquent remarks.

The gentleman from Texas talked about some businessmen that he met with, some labor leaders, church people, and a lawyer, and you get the feeling that there is some pluralism there in the country. And I would like to describe, just very briefly, by quoting Bayardo Arce, who is the leading ideolog of the Nicaraguan Communist movement, his remarks at a small Moscow-line Communist party allied to the Sandinistas. It was actually picked up in a Spanish newspaper 2 months later. It was thought to be secret, but it was not. It is, however, an important document, as it reveals the Sandinistas strategy of trying to deceive world opinion with progressive rhetoric.

Now, among the factors that Arce noted in assuring the survival of the regime was "achieving some degree of domestic neutralization in the United States * * *."

He explained that the regime's initial commitment to nonalignment, a mixed economy and political pluralism "kept the international community from going along with American policy in Nicaragua * * *."

So these vestiges of labor unions, and businesses, and church, these have no long-range potential whatsoever. They use these vestiges to convince some of the less aware members of international community that they are still not totally Communist.

Speaking of the elections for a president and constituent assembly scheduled for 1984, Arce found them "a nuisance, just as a number of things that make up the reality of our revolution are a nuisance."

He said, "Of course, if we did not have the war situation imposed on us by the United States, the electoral problem would be totally out of place in terms of its usefulness."

"Concessions to political pluralism thus were a tactical maneuver in the strategic effort to construct a Communist state," Arce said.

□ 2405

I will just close with this: "We are using an instrument claimed by the bourgeoisie which disarms the international bourgeoisie in order to move ahead in matters that for us are strategic.

"On the one hand, it allows us to neutralize the aggressiveness of imperialism, while on the other, it is going to provide us with a tool for moving ahead on substantive aspects of our revolution."

He also spoke of "All this artifice of pluralism which has been useful thus far that is over," and he ended, "We must take advantage of the change offered by the elections to gain other positive benefits, the unity of the Marxist-Leninists of Nicaragua."

Now, I know this kind of speech sounds like gobbledegook; it is right out of Newspeak and 1984. This is the way Communist officials speak; it is the language of the Marxist-Leninists, but I think it really does show how they have sought to deceive the American people, to deceive well-meaning Americans who want peace, to deceive our church groups and some of our more liberal elements in our society.

I think it is shown now to be quite a deceitful maneuver to simply manipulate our opinion and without substance. The gentleman's recent experiences inside Nicaragua indicate that these vestiges of pluralism and freedom are almost entirely gone.

Mr. DELAY. And they will be gone, and I thank the gentleman for participating in my special order.

I will conclude with saying that all of the rhetoric aside, all the arguments aside, I think it comes down to do we want another satellite state for the sake of Texas, the United States, the security of our country, the security of our Western Hemisphere; do we want another satellite state that is actually controlled by the Soviets through the Cubans in our backyard? That is the vote Thursday. That will be the debate tomorrow, and I think the American people should analyze this debate and try to cut through all of the rhetoric that is going to happen tomorrow and ask themselves do they want to send $100 million to help freedom fighters fight for themselves or do we want to wait for negotiations and allow the Sandinista Communists to laugh at us once again waiting for negotiations that they have broken off.

I might say the Senator from Tennessee made the statement Sunday night that President Reagan broke off the negotiations which is a total misstatement. The Sandinistas asked for an extension of the Contadora process until this summer. Are we or are we not going to fight communism in our backyard and in our hemisphere and that is the question that we must ask ourselves.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman will yield for one last point, I think the gentleman makes a good point. I think the question asked another way is: Will the people of the United States be safer or will they be less safe if we help those who would oppose a Soviet-Cuban domination of Nicaragua in Central America.

I think the answer is extraordinarily clear. Because the alternative to not helping those who would fight for their own freedom and prevent the establishment of the Soviet-Cuban base on the North American Continent, the alternative is the establishment of that base and the eventual conflict between us and the Soviets and the Cubans which could be far more costly, far more dangerous.

The safest route indeed, the least-risk route is to help those who would help themselves before we have to go in and do the job.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DELAY. I could not put it any better than that and I do thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I must thank the employees of the House for spending this time. It is now 10 minutes after 12 eastern time. Our employees work very hard to put up with us, and we do appreciate it. We appreciate the time that they spend away from their families working for us and working for America.

We do appreciate it.

If any firearm is so disposed of by a licensee within one year after its transfer from his business inventory into such licensee's personal collection or if such disposition or any other acquisition is made for the purpose of willfully evading the restrictions placed upon licensees by this chapter, then such firearm shall be deemed part of such licensee's business inventory.";

No proceedings for the revocation of a license shall be instituted by the Secretary more than one year after the filing of the indictment or information.";

(7) so that subsection (g) reads as follows:

"(g)(1)(A) Each licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, and licensed dealer shall maintain such records of importation, production, shipment, receipt, sale, or other disposition of firearms at his place of business for such period, and in such form, as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe. Such importers, manufacturers, and dealers shall not be required to submit to the Secretary reports and information with respect to such records and the contents thereof, except as expressly required by this section. The Secretary, when he has reasonable cause to believe a violation of this chapter has occurred and that evidence thereof may be found on such premises, may, upon demonstrating such cause before a Federal magistrate and securing from such magistrate a warrant authorizing entry, enter during business hours, the premises (includes places of storage) of any licensed firearms importer, licensed manufacturer, licensed dealer, licensed collector, or any licensed importer or manufacturer of ammunition, for the purpose of inspecting or examining—

"(i) any records or documents required to be kept by such licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, licensed dealer, or licensed collector under this chapter or rules or regulations under this chapter, and

"(ii) any firearms or ammunition kept or stored by such licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, licensed dealer, or licensed collector, at such premises.

"(B) The Secretary may inspect or examine the inventory and records of a licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, or licensed dealer without such reasonable cause or warrant—

"(i) in the course of a reasonable inquiry during the course of a criminal investigation of a person or persons other than the licensee;

"(ii) for ensuring compliance with the record keeping requirements of this chapter not more than once during any 12-month period; or

"(iii) when such inspection or examination may be required for determining the disposition of one or more particular firearms in the course of a bona fide criminal investigation.

"(C) The Secretary may inspect the inventory and records of a licensed collector without such reasonable cause or warrant—

"(i) for ensuring compliance with the record keeping requirements of this chapter not more than once during any 12-month period; or

"(ii) when such inspection or examination may be required for determining the disposition of one or more particular firearms in the course of a bona fide criminal investigation.

"(D) At the election of a licensed collector, the annual inspection of records and inventory permitted under this paragraph shall be performed at the office of the Secretary designated for such inspections which is located in closest proximity to the premises where the inventory and records of such licensed collector are maintained. The inspection and examination authorized by this paragraph shall not be construed as authorizing the Secretary to seize any records or other documents than those records or documents constituting material evidence of a violation of law. If the Secretary seizes such records or documents, copies shall be provided the licensee within a reasonable time. The Secretary may make available to any Federal, State, or local law enforcement agency any information which he may obtain by reason of this chapter with respect to the identification of persons prohibited from purchasing or receiving firearms or ammunition who have purchased or received firearms or ammunition, together with a description of such firearms or ammunition, and he may provide information to the extent such information may be contained in the records required to be maintained by this chapter, when so requested by any Federal, State, or local law enforcement agency.

"(2) Each licensed collector shall maintain in a bound volume the nature of which the Secretary may by regulations prescribe, records of the receipt, sale, or other disposition of firearms. Such records shall include the name and address of any person to whom the collector sells or otherwise disposes of a firearm. Such collector shall not be required to submit to the Secretary reports and information with respect to such records and the contents thereof, except as expressly required by this section.

"(3) Each licensee shall prepare a report of multiple sales or other dispositions whenever the licensee sells or otherwise disposes of, at one time or during any five consecutive business days, two or more pistols, or revolvers, or any combination of pistols and revolvers totaling two or more, to an unlicensed person. The report shall be prepared on a form specified by the Secretary and forwarded to the office specified thereon not later than the close of business on the day that the multiple sale or other disposition occurs.

"(4) Where a firearms or ammunition business is discontinued and succeeded by a new licensee, the records required to be kept by this chapter shall appropriately reflect such facts and shall be delivered to the successor. Where discontinuance of the business is absolute, such records shall be delivered within 30 days after the business discontinuance to the Secretary. However, where State law or local ordinance requires the delivery of records to other responsible authority, the Secretary may arrange for the delivery of such records to such other responsible authority.

"(5)(A) Each licensee shall, when required by letter issued by the Secretary, and until notified to the contrary in writing by the Secretary, submit on a form specified by the Secretary, for periods and at the times specified in such letter, all record information required to be kept by this chapter or such lesser record information as the Secretary in such letter may specify.

"(B) The Secretary may authorize such record information to be submitted in a manner other than that prescribed in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph when it is shown by a licensee that an alternate method of reporting is reasonably necessary and will not unduly hinder the effective administration of this chapter. A licensee may use an alternate method of reporting if the licensee describes the proposed alternate method of reporting and the need therefor in a letter application submitted to the Secretary, and the Secretary approves such alternate method of reporting."; and

(8) so that subsection (j) reads as follows:

"(j) A licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, or licensed dealer may, under rules or regulations prescribed by the Secretary, conduct business temporarily at a location other than the location specified on the license if such temporary location is the location for a gun show or event sponsored by any national, State, or local organization, or any affiliate of any such organization devoted to the collection, competitive use, or other sporting use of firearms in the community, and such location is in the State which is specified on the license. Records of receipt and disposition of firearms transactions conducted at such temporary location shall include the location of the sale or other disposition and shall be entered in the permanent records of the licensee and retained on the location specified on the license. Nothing in this subsection shall authorize any licensee to conduct business in or from any motorized or towed vehicle. Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, a separate fee shall not be required of a licensee with respect to business conducted under this subsection. Any inspection or examination of inventory or records under this chapter by the Secretary at such temporary location shall be limited to inventory consisting of, or records relating to, firearms held or disposed at such temporary location. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to authorize the Secretary to inspect or examine the inventory or records of a licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, or licensed dealer at any location other than the location specified on the license. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to diminish in any manner any right to display, sell, or otherwise dispose of firearms or ammunition, which is in effect before the date of the enactment of the Firearms Owners' Protection Act.".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SANE STUDENT ESSAYS

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, ours is an age in which the threat of a nuclear holocaust is an omnipresent concern. Our fear of nuclear war is one of the most powerful emotions of our nuclear age. Ironically, the immensity of our fear may lull us into a feeling of powerlessness—we are told, and often believe, that only experts can understand issues of such complexity. This is at once our greatest illusion and our greatest danger, for it is the opinions of all citizens which help shape the future of our world.

One of the leaders in informing us of our responsibility, and the hope that it represents, is the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy [SANE]. In addition to providing information in the form of its manuals and information booklets, SANE sets itself a higher goal, that of encouraging people at all ages to involve themselves in thinking about nuclear issues. One way that this effort manifests itself is in the school essay contests which the group sponsors.

I would like today to salute the winners of this year's essay contest sponsored by SANE's Brooklyn affiliate. Through these essays we can see that the fear of nuclear war is pervasive, even affecting our children's view of the future. Nowhere can this better be seen than in these essays.

The middle division winners were: Rishi Puntes, Kali Taylor, and Alex Berenberg. Honorable mention went to Joanna Weiner, Mary Claire Montilus, and Justina Ugwudi. All are students at the Brooklyn Friends School.

In the upper division, first prize went to Saj Freiberg; second prize to Joseph Sigelman; and third prize to Steven Vas. All are students at St. Ann's School.

The two first prize essays follow:

WHY PEACEFUL SOLUTIONS TO WORLD PROBLEMS ARE NEEDED

(By Rishi Puntes)

Look at our world. . . . We have condemned ourselves through selfishness and greed. Think . . . of all the innocent people suffering all over the world, in Africa, the Middle East, England, even in New York City! Many of these conditions would not exist if there were world peace.

Nuclear war is a constant threat to the human race. Many countries are now building more and more nuclear weapons, especially the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. Yet I fail to see the point for the U.S. and Soviet Union to build any more, when together they can blow up the world eight times. What's more, if you survive a nuclear war the fallout would contaminate your food and drinking water, therefore, in time you too would not survive. Yet if you do survive you will catch strange diseases. And should you survive them, you just might be the only person left.

Another major problem with a world with no peace is that each and every country feels endangered without a sizable amount of weaponry. Meanwhile, all the leaders say "We don't intend to use them." Every country has a large amount of homeless, starving people. The money spent on the arms race could be spent on those people and together we could wipe out world famine of all kinds, for good!

Yes, peaceful solutions are needed and quickly. For if we do not establish world peace we will bury each other among the rubble. Whether it be by war, starvation, racism, the conditions keep getting worse. One country wins, the other loses, it's all so repetitive. The world's rich grow richer as the world's poor grow poorer. And I believe that this situation will continue until people get fed up and stop this evil plague.

Yet if these patterns keep up we will soon have two supreme powers, the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. Every other country will be either on the Soviet Union's "team" (communist) or the U.S.A.'s "team" (democratic). Then the tensions will increase greatly among the two forces, and just a minute problem will make everybody's destiny quite clear.

So this is our glorious world! This is what we have created over years: a mess. I'm not saying that there is no hope, but I am saying that we're going to have to work really hard to improve our world.

ABOUT-FACE

(By Saj Freiberg)

Ever since time began man has been at war with something, whether himself or nature. Using violence to end any conflict is all too common in history. It is sad, although man is the most intelligent being on earth his reaction to conflict is the same as the most simple of beasts.

Unfortunately for us as man has grown more advanced he has not become peaceful in fact he has improved his tools of war. From the bone of a dead animal to a submachine gun, man has strived to build weapons that can kill more, faster, and better. How man has so advanced in his pursuit that he can now slay all there is to kill in under one-hundred-and-eighty minutes.

Nuclear arms are the final advancement in mans weapons "improvements". We cannot destroy any more easily, we cannot cause more death. Some now say "Hold on, war is O.K. but we cannot kill everything". The new power of destruction we are capable of has disturbed many people, and well it should. We can no longer think that if a world war occurs we will not get hit by the bullet, because if a global nuclear war takes place no one will survive. No one. This fact scared many people, that is obvious, but this new concern has a self centered basis, people who before did not rise up against war now cry in rage because they know that the warning signal that comes on their T.V. sets will not be a warning but a death warrent.

Nuclear war is that, war, a devastating unimaginable holocaust, which if allowed to occur will be once again caused by mans habitual use of violence to end his disputes.

To erase the threat which now faces us we must reeducate ourselves. We must make an about-face on our path of war and start on the long hard road to peace. This idea may sound like a utopian dream and it is; yet it is a dream that must become a reality if the earth's surface is not to be reduced to radioactive slag, and its inhabitants to become extinct. We must change the human instinct of aggression into the human instinct of peace. And so the solution is not a verifiable reduction of half the worlds nuclear warheads over a thirty year period of time; it is a new way of thinking, a realization that man must now lift his primeval instincts out of the mud and wash himself free of his inherent violent nature.

I realize that what I have written is not really a solution, but much like saying, "The way to stop famine is to feed everyone." The plain truth is that I am too young and ignorant to know how to root out one of man's basic instincts but I feel, I know, that our species can keep itself from suicide if only it would seriously apply itself to the task, instead of waiting for a sudden godlike light of realization to come and do it for us. Or until it is too late.

DANIEL W. FISH REVIEWS "WITH THE CONTRAS"

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, the debate on aid to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance has often turned to the character of the resistance fighters, and this discussion has often been based on the accounts of Christopher Dickey, a Washington Post reporter, in his book "With the Contras."

This book, like most lengthy accounts of its kind, lends itself to selective quoting. While we frequently hear of the abuses that Dickey describes—crimes for which the Contras have disciplined and even executed some of their troops—we seldom hear of the evidence of popular support for the Contras that is also found in Dickey's book.

I submit for the RECORD a review of "With the Contras" that appeared in the March 22, 1986, edition of Human Events. This insightful review, written by Daniel W. Fish of the Republican Study Committee, gives a balanced account of the book, and is deserving of our careful attention. Once again, Mr. Fish has used his considerable analytical skill to make a valuable contribution to the foreign policy debate.

The review follows:

CONTRAS RECEIVE INADVERTENT BOOST FROM DICKEY

(By Daniel Fish)

For six days in March 1983, Washington Post reporter Christopher Dickey traveled "in the wilds of Nicaragua" with a group of "Contras"—the name given to those fighting the Communist regime in Nicaragua. With the Contras is Dickey's account of his brief Contra tour and the so-called "dirty little war in Nicaragua."

With the Contras is the latest fad among Contra aid opponents. Here, we are told, is "proof" of the "Contra-as-Satan" theory. Here are the revelations about "Somocistas" (former Somoza supporters), their atrocities, and the evil doings of the U.S. government, in particular the CIA. In short, just about every accusation thrown at the Nicaraguan opposition can be found in Dickey's book.

Christopher Dickey, and the paper he works for, have often misrepresented events in Nicaragua. During the war against Somoza, for instance, Post reporter Karen DeYoung's dispatches glamorized the Sandinistas. In many ways, With the Contras follows this tradition.

In a glaring example, Sandinista Interior Minister Tomas Borge, a committed Communist, is described as "this little man with the voice of a poet, the eyes of a zealot, [with] the collected icons of pain."

We read that one of Borge's talents is that "he appreciated the nuances, even the beauty of pain." Borge, reports Dickey, "could speak of suffering with the empathy of experience, artfully and persuasively. . . ." This was reflected in his office decor, where "in wood and in metal, in stone and in straw, figures of Christ on the cross covered the walls. . . ."

Borge understands the nuances of pain not only because he was imprisoned by Somoza, but, more importantly, because he presides over the huge apparatus of repression that is at the heart of Sandinista Nicaragua. But we find nothing about this in With the Contras.

Dickey didn't mention why Borge has "the eyes of a zealot," or that Borge is committed to Latin Stalinism, or that Borge's real office contains "icons" to Marxism-Leninism. According to Alvaro Baldizon, Borge's former chief investigator, the office with the figures of Christ is used only to impress "useful idiots," those important disciples in communism's advance.

The centerpiece of Dickey's narrative is the Nicaraguan armed resistance, not the Sandinista repression that has led to armed rebellion. But even on this main topic, Dickey's reporting is far from thorough.

With the Contras does not look at the entire Contra force as it existed in 1983 and it largely ignores what has happened since mid-1984. Dickey's account is only one episode in the evolution of the Nicaraguan resistance. However, by focusing on one group, numbering 400 out of 4,000 Contras in 1983, Dickey tries to paint a stereotype of the anti-Sandinista movement.

"Suicida" (Suicide), a former National Guardsman, is the main character in With the Contras. Dickey introduces Suicida as he's retreating from Nicaragua in July 1979. We follow his story until he and his top commanders are executed for their abuses.

In the annals of Contra atrocities, Suicida is one of the major contributors: after the Sandinistas murdered his lover, Suicida went on a rampage, looting, raping and killing civilians, and rustling cattle—a story with all the makings of a Nicaraguan Dodge City.

None of these atrocities happens during Dickey's six-day Contra trip. He sees no abuses, only hears about them. Dickey mentions the execution of Suicida and his main commanders for their crimes, and he writes of efforts to purge the Contra movement of both "Somocistas" and criminals.

Without question, Suicida and some of his band were thugs. And there have been abuses—on both sides. But critics of the Contras present Suicida as the norm, not the exception, among the Contras. And that's wrong.

Dickey's book—and his earlier Washington Post articles—portray the Contras as something other than a group of CIA-hired Somocistas bent on destruction of pleasure.

Instead, With the Contras presents evidence that contradicts many of the claims made by opponents of U.S. assistance to the Contras.

For instance, critics claim that the Contras have no popular support and are little better than criminals. But in the April 3, 1983, Washington Post, Dickey reported, "The [Contras] led by Suicida appeared to count on considerable and invaluable support among the few peasants left in the increasingly deserted war zone. The locals . . . sold provisions to the troops with which we traveled, sheltered them and often provided them with intelligence about Sandinista movements."

This assessment is reiterated in With the Contras. No sign of intimidation or popular dissatisfaction is evident. On the contrary, Dickey's Contra patrol seems welcome wherever it goes.

Led by commander "Krill," Dickey's Contra patrol comes to a home "where two women tended a pot full of meat, preparing to feed our patrol." The Contras pay for the food.

At another Contra camp a farmer brings them morning coffee. And, at a third location, writes Dickey, "We were welcomed passively, without fear or pleasure, it seemed." The Contras give this family some money to help them through. There are no threats, no violence, or atrocities. In fact, it's all very civilized—and this with the worst band of Contra fighters!

So who are these people who allegedly rape, torture and kill? Well, reports Dickey, ". . . most appeared to have been small landowners whose property had been taken from them by the Sandinistas or were told it would be or just believed that it would be. There were evangelicals who believed they could not worship under the Sandinista government. There were sons with their fathers."

And get this: When the patrol came to rest, did they plot whom to torture next? No, instead, ". . . many of them [would] take out worn Bibles to read, word by word, to themselves." These are the kind of people the U.S. shouldn't support?

Another criticism allegedly confirmed by Dickey is that the Contras are a reincarnation of Somoza's National Guard.

It's true that some of the Contras are former National Guard members. Suicida and his main commanders are an obvious case in point. Today, however, no more than two per cent are former Guardsmen, while at least 20 per cent are former Sandinistas.

Alfonso Robelo relates an interesting comment about the question of "Somocistas" in the Contra movement made to him by then-Newsweek reporter James LeMoyne, Dickey's companion during his Contra trip. Robelo says, "[LeMoyne] said that among the forces with which he coexisted—some 400 men—there were 12 former National Guardsmen or 3 per cent of the FDN combatants that he saw."

A third criticism one hears is that President Reagan wants to overthrow the Sandinistas.

Dickey's book doesn't support this assertion. It does, however, confirm that as far as U.S. policy is concerned, the Contras are intended to pressure the Sandinistas to stop exporting subversion and to fulfill their promises to the Organization of American States (OAS). In July 1979, the OAS recognized the Sandinistas as the Nicaraguan government on the condition that they respect human rights, allow political pluralism, and hold free and fair elections.

In August 1981, then-Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders traveled to Nicaragua to seek a negotiated settlement. The U.S. offered to accept the Sandinistas if they stopped exporting revolution and agreed to implement their promises to the OAS. The Sandinistas rejected the U.S. proposal.

Three months later in November, the President approved National Security Decision Directive 17 establishing U.S. participation in a Contra program. This decision directed the U.S. to "Build popular support in Central America and Nicaragua for an opposition front that would be nationalistic, anti-Cuban and anti-Somoza. . ." to pressure the Sandinistas (emphasis added).

Contra leaders confirm that the U.S. objective wasn't to overthrow the Sandinistas. Buried in a footnote on page 300, Dickey quotes former FDN member Aristides Sanchez as saying, "The people who worked with us closely have always had the intention of making a movement that was small and incapable of overthrowing the Sandinistas by force of arms." "The people" he refers to are the Americans.

With the Contras is not the "I was there" account it's hyped to be. We read that it's as "factual as tomorrow's headlines" and that its revelations are "shocking" and "important."

In fact, the book is little better than hearsay and gossip—and "tomorrow's" headlines are from 1983, not 1986.

The Contras are representative of Nicaraguan society. They are predominantly campesinos, small landowners, students, businessmen and ministers. They are a deeply religious people.

Dickey, and many Contra opponents, have missed the simple reason for Nicaragua's civil war: the Sandinista betrayal of the anti-Somoza revolution.

If there's anything immoral about U.S. support for the Contras, it's that we aren't trying to overthrow the comandantes in Managua.

THE NEW REPUBLIC MAKES THE CASE FOR THE CONTRAS

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the United States has achieved several real foreign policy successes in the last 3 years which were almost unthinkable in the 1970's. Each such case was accomplished in a way that was appropriate to the particular circumstances, and in each case an authoritarian or totalitarian regime was replaced by a government more open to the democratic process.

The specific circumstances in Nicaragua also require a suitable response. What could be more revealing about the Sandinista government's nature than the fact that Commandante Daniel Ortega, who was in Moscow the day we voted on humanitarian assistance to the freedom fighters last year, has turned up this week in Havana, the capital of the Western Hemisphere's only Communist nation? Clearly an unchallenged pro-Soviet regime in Central America would represent a security threat to this country which could not be tolerated by the American people.

President Reagan has proposed a specific course of action to stop this threat by strengthening the internal opposition to the Sandinista regime. Humanitarian and military aid to the resistance of $100 million represents the lowest risk strategy now available to persuade the Sandinistas to permit genuine democratic elections. As we saw in the Philippines, elections can be a powerful force for freedom. According to our own principles, the Nicaraguan people have the same moral right to a democratic revolution as the Haitians, the Filipinos, the Grenadians, and all people, have.

This week's New Republic supports assistance to Nicaragua's real revolutionaries. I do not think either political party wants to be blamed for the communization of Central America. Rather it appears that we are rapidly developing a bipartisan consensus on the idea of expanding the democratic opportunities of the Nicaraguan people while protecting the security of the Western Hemisphere. I hope my colleagues consider this editorial carefully before voting on the bipartisan assistance proposal.

THE CASE FOR THE CONTRAS

The upcoming vote in Congress on military aid to the Nicaraguan contras is one of the most important foreign policy votes of the decade. The future of Central America hinges on its outcome.

The position of the contras is precarious. They certainly have people: anywhere from 14,000 to 20,000 depending on whom you believe. That represents about twice the number of guerrillas in El Salvador, a country with about twice the population of Nicaragua. And about three times the number of Sandinista troops at the time of the overthrow of Somoza.

They also have people on the home front. Not even the most anti-contra-aid congressman denies that the Sandinistas have become extremely unpopular. Among those strongly opposed to Sandinista rule is the Church, the most popular institution in Nicaraguan society. The pope's divisions are not the only disaffected. These now include ordinary people deprived of the necessities of life in a wrecked economy; the business and middle classes, which have been denied the promises of freedom; and many intellectuals, some in exile, who don't relish life as functionaries of the state. The contras, a peasant army, themselves represent the deep resentment in the countryside at Sandinista offenses to tradition and religion. Add to that the general uprising of the Miskitos against Sandinista colonialism, and you have a vast popular opposition. These are the people whose hopes would be betrayed by the liquidiation of the armed resistance and the consolidation of Sandinista rule, which will be the inevitable result of an American denial of military aid to the contras.

But if they are so many, why haven't they already won? For the same reason Solidarity, ten million strong, lost in Poland. Under Leninist regimes, Philippine-style "people power" does not do terribly well. Nor do vastly out-gunned, out-trained guerrilla armies do well against Cuban-Soviet-style military machines.

The Soviets have poured something on the order of $500 million in arms into Nicaragua in the the last five years. Since 1984 the U.S. has been prevented from sending the contras a penny's worth of arms. The recent delivery of helicopter gunships to Sandinistas, reportedly piloted in combat by Cubans, has been decisive. It has made it extremely difficult for the contras to move and to resupply. In the absence of antiaircraft weaponry, they are quite defenseless.

As a result, contra advances and successes in the past several years are being reversed. In the last six months, particularly since the introduction of the MI-24 gunships, all but between 3,000 and 6,000 contras have been driven from Nicaragua. The rest are in Honduran camps waiting for arms. In civil wars numbers alone can't determine the outcome, particularly if one's side is barely armed.

And also barely trained. Again out of congressional scrupulousness, the U.S. military has been prohibited from training and professionalizing the contra forces, as it has done in El Salvador with a resulting marked improvement in the country's human rights record. It is somewhat paradoxical to argue that we shouldn't be training the contras because they are so undisciplined when one of the major reasons this peasant army remains undisciplined is that the U.S. military is prohibited from training it.

Thus the upcoming vote will be critical. Without military aid, the contras will fight and bleed perhaps for some time longer, but without hope. First to wither will be the armed resistance, overcome by vastly superior Soviet-supplied firepower. Then, just as certainly, the unarmed resistance, demoralized and abandoned, will follow, leaving the Sandinistas in total, permanent control of Nicaragua.

What's so bad about that? What, after all, does the resistance hope to achieve? Sandinista defense minister Humberto Ortega explained it well when, in 1981, he denounced former Sandinista junta member Alfonso Robelo as an enemy of the revolution. "The democracy that Robelo asks," charged Ortega, "is . . . that they [the bourgeoisie, presumably] have the army, the power, and that we Sandinistas be what the left is in Costa Rica, a sector, an organization that is free to move about, that publishes its newspaper." In other words, Robelo wants, for Nicaragua, Costa Rican-style democracy, where all political tendencies, including the left, are free to compete for (rotating) power. For Humberto Ortega, such a program amounts to political criminality. It is what made the Sandinistas push Robelo out of the junta, crush his party, and drive him to exile and resistance. Robelo is now one of the three leaders of the contra political leadership, the United Nicaraguan Opposition, known as UNO.

What is at stake in this civil war is any hope for a democratic Nicaragua. The end of the contras means the end of that hope. And a ban on military aid will likely mean, sooner or later, the end of the contras.

One would think that House Democrats, who for years have been urging, pushing, encouraging, threatening, and finally celebrating the return of democracy in the Philippines, would be equally eager to see democracy returned to Nicaragua. But they are not. Why? They put up a case that we find, for an issue of this gravity, stunningly weak.

By what right does the U.S. try to bring democracy to a place where it enforced dictatorship for so long? This is the "because of our tainted history we have no moral standing" argument. It is mystifying. The United States stood by the dictatorship in Haiti for at least three decades. Does that mean that we should therefore have ruled ourselves morally ineligible to assist in the transition to democracy? The United States ruled the Philippines as a colony for nearly five decades, then stood by a dictator for the last two. Does that mean that the United States should have disqualified itself from aiding the restoration of democracy?

Certainly the U.S. has a very blemished history in Nicaragua. It is equally certain that our aims now are different than they were 60, even 20, years ago. As in Guatemala and El Salvador, as in the Philippines and Haiti and other places where our history is stained, in Nicaragua the relevant question is American intentions today, not Teddy Roosevelt's at the time of the building of the Panama Canal.

We have no right to try to impose democracy on another country. After the Philippines and Haiti, and the general self-congratulatory jubilation of liberals and conservatives alike over two triumphs of American diplomacy, this argument stands exposed as a camouflage. Those who advocate dramatic American intervention in pro-American dictatorships should not be suddenly stricken with scrupulousness about the sanctity of sovereignty when intervention is proposed in states ruled by pro-Soviet Leninists.

But one situation involves peaceful change; the other, war. If in Nicaragua transition to democracy were possible without war, we too would oppose any fighting. But that option does not exist. Does anyone believe that the Sandinistas will ever peacefully transfer power or permit a free allocation of power by election?

The contras can't win. This argument is invariably heard from those who vote again and again to cut off aid to the contras. Yes, unarmed they can't win. Maybe House Democrats expect Nicaraguan democrats to win by lying down in front of Sandinista tanks, Philippines style.

Can the contras win the way the North Vietnamese won in South Vietnam? No, but they can win in the way the Sandinistas won in Managua. They could win not by rolling over the Sandinista army, but by controlling the countryside, which would in turn help undermine what little urban support the Sandinistas have. A Leninist regime with a conscript army on the defensive, losing the countryside and undermined in the city, would ultimately find its situation untenable.

The contras are not democrats but Somocistas. It is true that some top commanders are ex-Guardia. But even the most conservative (and powerful) of the three political leaders, Adolfo Calero, was a longtime opponent of Somoza and jailed for his efforts. The other UNO leader, Arturo Cruz, an impeccable democrat, says the contras represent "the revolt of Nicaraguans against oppression by other Nicaraguans." One doesn't raise an army of 15,000 peasants with promises of restoring a universally despised dictatorship.

We should try diplomacy, not force. The United States should be working out with the Sandinistas some kind of diplomatic arrangement under the umbrella of Contadora. This imagined solution to Sandinista regional power and ambitions is a parchment barrier: the Sandinistas are given free rein within their borders, and in return, they promise not to trespass on anyone else's. Certainly we can expect the Sandinistas to adhere initially to such a nonaggression or revolution-with-frontiers agreement. Time enough for the contras to wither away and be repatriated in Miami. At which point the Sandinistas will be secure in the knowledge that no future opponents are ever going to risk their lives in a second insurgency, having seen the first one sold out. With a free hand, does anyone imagine that they will adhere to their agreements any more than, say, the Vietnamese adhered to theirs? We have experience with Sandinista parchment. In 1979 they pledged to the Organization of American States to establish an open, democratic, and pluralistic society.

It takes willful blindness to imagine that some kind of paper agreement with the Sandinistas that allows them to consolidate their power will ensure stability in Central America. In fact, the opposite is almost certainly the case. A highly militarized, highly disciplined country with by far the largest army in Central America, with ideological ambitions stretching far beyond its borders, and supported by Cuba and the Soviet Union, is bound to be a source of constant instability in a region of weak and fledgling democracies.

The neighboring countries seem to want a Contadora solution. What does one expect from, say, Costa Rica, a country with no army facing a 50,000-man military across its border? It sees a starved insurgency, an isolationist U.S. Congress, and a rising military power in Managua. Does one expect Costa Rica publicly to come out in support of overthrowing its neighbor, given the odds now that its neighbor will be in power permanently? Of course such countries will make muted public statements. But as many of the leaders of these weak democracies told the Kissinger Commission and others since, they are desperate to see the United States get rid of Sandinistas for them.

What is the government of Colombia, one of the original Contadora countries, to say? It publicly denies but privately knows that an assault on its Palace of Justice and the massacre of its Supreme Court was carried out by M-19 guerrillas with weapons of Nicaraguan origin. It knows that Sandinista commandante Tomas Borges attended a mass, complete with an M-19 flag draped over the altar, for the guerrillas killed in that raid. The reach of the Sandinistas is impressive. Latin American governments, many of which face left-wing insurgencies, are hardly likely to make themselves more of a target by public calls for the Yankees to save them from communists.

The contra policy is driving the Sandinistas into the hands of the Soviets. It is hard for Americans to believe that some people act out of ideological conviction. Look, therefore, at what the Sandinistas did long before there was a Reagan, long before there were contras. In one year the Carter administration gave them in aid the equivalent of half of what Somoza received in 16 years, and during that time they systematically eliminated their democratic allies and aligned themselves with the Soviets.

On June 23, 1981, Humberto Ortega said to the Sandinsta army and militia officers: "We are saying that Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our Vanguard for understanding [the revolution's] historic process and for carrying out the revolution. . . ." He then asserted that the FSLN had made the pact with the moderate opposition only for the purposes of getting rid of Somoza, holding off U.S. intervention, and keeping the economy in place.

It is remarkable that for House Democrats Sandinista ideological commitment requires constant theatrical demonstration. It took Daniel Ortega's flight to Moscow a few days after a contra vote last year to dramatize Managua's connection with Moscow. You can be sure that this time Ortega's handlers will take away his American Express card until after the vote. Don't expect to see him visiting New York for eye wear or Moscow for hardware until the coast is clear.

The Cubans and Soviets will match our escalation. This is the counsel of pure defeatism. It cedes to the Soviets the power to set the level of violence and superpower commitment on the North American continent. It is, in effect, to say that the Soviets will to annex Nicaragua exceeds that of the United States to prevent it from happening. The prophecy is, of course, self-fulfilling.

The contras will draw the United States into war. Probably the root argument, certainly the one on which Tip O'Neill hangs his hat. Its origin is the fear of another Vietnam and the isolationist hope that if we only will stay out of this fight no harm will come to us.

But nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off, and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army. Of course, American military involvement can never be ruled out. But destroying the only indigenous armed opposition to the Nicaraguans hardly seems the way to prevent it.

And what will be more likely to bring about American military involvement? Even Democrats argue that the United States has a vital interest in preventing the establishment of a Soviet base in Nicaragua. Even Democrats would call for American military action in that situation. Walter Mondale, for example, suggested a quarantine. When tried in October 1962, that idea brought us closer to World War III than any other moment in postwar history. A democratic Nicaragua is the only guarantee that the threat will not materialize.

The consolidation of the Sandinistas will lead to a second Cuba on the mainland, or more precisely, to an enlarged first Cuba. As Robelo recalls, during his days in the ruling junta no important decision was ever made without the assent of the Cuban invariably present at the meeting. Even those who think it sentimental for the United States to concern itself with the state of pluralism and democracy in other countries must recognize what a strategic defeat the establishment of a Soviet satellite in Central America would constitute for the United States.

We do not have any illusions about the tragedy that is civil war and the suffering it causes. Guerrilla war is of necessity nasty, brutish, and long. And this peasant army, ill-trained and ill-equipped, is hardly a perfect model for insurgency. But our choice is this model—which could be vastly improved in combat effectiveness and discipline if given sufficient American aid and training—or none.

We believe that preventing the establishment of a Leninist dictatorship in Nicaragua is a goal worthy of American support, and that those willing to fight for this cause are deserving of American assistance. A decision to support one side in a civil war is not one to be taken lightly. We come to it in the full realization that, whatever tragedy it brings, the liquidation of the democratic side of Nicaraguan civil war will bring infinitely more tragedy to Nicaragua, to Central America, and ultimately to the rest of the hemisphere.

"UNO POLICIES ARE NOT ACCEPTABLE TO MOST NICARAGUANS," INDIAN OPPOSITION LEADER DECLARES

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the administration has spent much time describing Sandinista violations against the rights of the Indian population in Nicaragua. There has also been condemnation on this side of the aisle of the violations committed by the Sandinistas, especially those in 1982, which resulted in the widespread suffering and displacement of thousands of Miskito, Sumo, and Rama Indians who inhabit the Altlantic coast of Nicaragua.

But what we never hear from the administration is that the same Indian forces who are fighting the Sandinista government also believe that the dominant forces within UNO—which is the political front organization of the FDN, the main Contra force—are enemies of Indian rights and are not a credible alternative to the Sandinistas. In a letter to Secretary Shultz, which I would like to share with my colleagues, Brookyn Rivera, the general coordinator of Misurasata, the largest Indian group fighting the Nicaraguan Government, says:

"We have repeatedly expressed our belief that the dominant forces within the UNO organization present a threat to our rights. Moreover, the political program of those forces indicates a commitment to failed policies of the past, policies which are not acceptable to most Nicaraguans who are still suffering within Nicaragua nor to most of the democratic opposition forces. Those dominant UNO forces are not acceptable to Nicaraguans and are not a credible alternative to the Sandinistas in the view of respected democratic friends of ours in the international community."

Mr. Speaker, these are the words of an admired and recognized Indian opposition leader. I urge my colleagues to compare Mr. Rivera's characterization of UNO to what the administration has said of the same organization.

The letter follows:

MISURASATA,
REPUBLIC DE NICARAGUA,
March 7, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
U.S. Department of State, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY SHULTZ: We deeply regret that we must decline the invitation to meet with you today. We have long sought a meeting with you to explain Misurasata's position on policies concerning Nicaragua. We hope we will soon be able to arrange a meeting at which we can have a frank exchange of information and ideas about the liberation of the Indian peoples of Nicaragua.

As you know, and as we have told the world, the Indian peoples of Nicaragua are suffering from barbaric repression by the Sandinistas. We need to defend our lives and our way of life from the unprecedented process of destruction by the Sandinistas. The very survival of our peoples is at issue, and we are reaching out for support from all democratic forces in the international community. We desperately need help.

Our grievances against the Sandinistas are unique in important respects for we are seeking vindication of our Indian rights to self-determination, land, natural resources, and way of life. In other respects our grievances are not unique, because thousands of other Nicaraguans have also faced repression and the denial of basic liberties. Thus, we acknowledge common interests with other opposition forces while we also must insist on preserving and strengthening Misurasata's own program to free our Indian peoples. Indian rights must remain our priority concern.

We have experienced serious threats to our Indian rights not only from the leftist Sandinistas but also from rightest elements and others. We are the victims of anti-Indian racism which is not neatly confined to one part of the political spectrum. Accordingly, we have learned from experience to make alliances carefully and to avoid situations where adversaries of Indian rights would seek to exploit the plight of our Indian peoples for political ends which ultimately will threaten us.

We have repeatedly expressed our belief that the dominant forces within the UNO organization present a threat to our rights. Moreover, the political program of those forces indicates a commitment to failed policies of the past, policies which are not acceptable to most Nicaraguans who are still suffering within Nicaragua nor to most of the democratic opposition forces. Those dominant UNO forces are not acceptable to Nicaraguans and are not a credible alternative to the Sandinistas in the view of respected democratic friends of ours in the international community.

Accordingly, we must exercise extreme care in avoiding even the appearance that we may be an ally or tool of those forces. If we are tainted by them, our international credibility and our struggle for Indian liberation will be badly damaged.

Please understand that I am not attributing ill motives to you or your staff. Also, please understand that we are not refusing to talk with any Nicaraguan political elements. We have talked with our worst enemy, the Sandinistas, and we will talk in appropriate contexts with all other Nicaraguans. But we will always maintain our principles and our independence.

We are committed to unity, and we recognize the need for broad political diversity in Nicaragua. We believe this would advance our efforts to secure our Indian rights. We are prepared to explore all reasonable opportunities to secure those rights.

Finally, as we have explained in depth to Elliot Abrams, our contribution to unity must begin with our people in Honduras. We must be permitted the opportunity to visit with our people and with our fellow Indian leaders in Honduras in order to strengthen and unify our Indian liberation forces. We respectfully urge you to give this matter your personal attention. It is one of the critical issues which we need to discuss at a meeting with you.

I wish to assure you of our respect and to thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

BROOKLYN RIVERA,
General Coordinator of Misurasata.

A TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL VENTRESCA

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a dear, personal friend of mine, and a constituent of Mr. MAVROULES of Massachusetts, recently was killed by a drunk driver. His name was Michael Ventresca. The death was tragic and senseless, because Michael Ventresca was destined to become a great political leader. He was already a superior individual and human being.

He was committed to progressive issues and candidates with intensity. He was a rambunctious, explosive, energetic, and caring human being. He will be missed even though he already had made a difference.

I submit the following article about Michael Ventresca.

[From the Boston Globe, Dec. 30, 1985]

POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS WERE HIS LIFEBLOOD

(By Chris Black)

There was never any doubt when Michael Ventresca and the "Ventreskites" hit town in 1980. If nothing else, the garrulous, irrepressible Ventresca made sure everyone knew they had arrived.

Ventresca was the master sergeant of a mobile unit of political soldiers for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's presidential campaign. His troops were nicknamed the Ventreskites because of their devotion to him.

His role in the Kennedy campaign typified his career in state and national politics. It not only showed his commitment to Kennedy and the progressive causes he espoused, but demonstrated the effect Ventresca had on others.

Michael Ventresca never walked into a room. He landed with his mouth going, head turning and arms waiving. At age 38, he was one of the most popular political organizers and lobbyists in the state. Yesterday, the perpetual motion machine was stilled when his car was smashed from behind by a car in Boston.

Gov. Dukakis last night said: "Mike's death is as senseless as it is tragic. He was a friend, a talented man and a loving husband. Kitty and I am deeply saddened by his family's loss."

Former Lt. Gov. Thomas P. O'Neill 3d said, "He was the consummate political animal who loved good goverment. The Pied Piper has died."

Ventresca once worked as O'Neill's legal counsel and helped plan O'Neill's unsuccessful campaign for governor in 1982.

"MOST BUOYANT PERSON"

"He was the most buoyant person I have ever met. He gave joy to everyone he dealt with," said Joseph S. Fitzpatrick, a longtime friend who is a former state energy secretary.

Ventresca grew up in Swampscott. He was a graduate of the University of Massachusetts-Boston, where he was president of the Class of 1969, and Suffolk University Law School, where he was editor of the Suffolk Law Review.

As a lawyer, he specialized in the environment. He worked as director of the Massachusetts Forest and Park Association, a private, nonprofit conservation group, and later as legal counsel to the state Coastal Zone Management office and to the state Office of Environmental Affairs, William J. McCarthy, general counsel of Associated Industries of Massachusetts, hired Ventresca in 1981 after he came to know him as a skilled adversary on environmental issue on Beacon Hill.

At AIM as an associate counsel for public affairs, Ventresca helped educate businesses in environmental law and lobbied for the organization at the State House. "He was an outstanding lobbyist in the better sense of the word. He was a great communicator who brought divergent points of view together and came out with solutions," said McCarthy.

Although his occupation was law, his avocation was politics. He had been involved in every major state and national campaign since the 1969 special 6th District congressional race won by Michael J. Harrington. In 1970, he was among a group of students who did research for Dukakis' unsuccessful lieutenant governor campaign.

CAMPAIGN GUNSLINGER

He was one of the campaign gunslingers, the political cowboys who followed the campaign trail from state to state.

In 1980, Ventresca conducted a military-like volunteer mobilization from behind a desk at 53 State St. Nearly 1,000 workers for Kennedy were dispatched to the caucus state of Maine to create the most extensive get-out-the-vote and canvassing operation ever seen there.

Over the years, he worked on campaigns for Dukakis, Kennedy, O'Neill, Gary Hart and John Kennedy.

Earlier this year, Mayor Flynn named him to the Boston Zoning Commission. Ventresca was one of those who voted in favor of allowing New England Mutual Life Insurance Co. to build its $289 million office-retail-commercial complex in the Back Bay.

He grew up in Swampscott and lived in a tiny townhouse on the back side of Beacon Hill with his wife, Rosalind Jordan, an attorney with the state Office of Communities and Development.

WORKING ON NEW PROJECT

At the time of his death, he was working on a project for Joseph P. Kennedy 2d, who is running for the Massachusetts 8th District congressional seat.

Yet he always found time for family and friends.

Yesterday, he was to have been host at a special party for his nieces and nephews. He had arranged for them to be picked up by a limousine in Swampscott and transported to his Beacon Hill home for a puppet show.

A funeral Mass will be said at St. Agatha's Church, Milton, at 10 a.m. Thursday. Burial will be in Milton Cemetery.

His family has established a scholarship fund in his memory for UMass-Boston students. Donations may be sent to First Bank, 44 Central Square, Chelmsford, Mass., 01824.

INVESTING IN HEALTHY BABIES: PREVENTING PREMATURITY AND LOW BIRTHWEIGHT

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, the Minnesota Coalition on Health has just completed a major study on the prevention of premature births and low birthweight. The coalition's findings are contained in a report, titled, "Investing in Healthy Babies: Preventing Prematurity and Low Birthweight."

Low birthweight [LBW] is a major contributor to infant death and millions of dollars are spent on hospital and medical are for LBW infants each year. In 1984 in Minnesota, the cost of medical care for LBW infants provided under Minnesota's Medical Assistance [Medicaid] Program alone was more than $6 million. The cost of LBW care for all infants statewide was close to $60 million. There is overwhelming evidence that prenatal care and other preventive measures reduced low birthweight and save health care dollars.

A broad, comprehensive approach is needed to reduce the incidence of low birthweight and related social and medical problems, including family planning, reproductive health education, pregnancy risk identification and reduction, and early prenatal care. Low birthweight and its consequences merit the attention of national, State, and local governments as well as various health professional groups.

Unfortunately, over the last 5 years, we have seen a severe retrenchment at the Federal level of support for programs designed to reduce the incidence of low birthweight. The Reagan administration has continually attempted to undercut some of the most basic programs, such as the WIC Program and various specific health care programs serving pregnant women and young mothers. The result is that we are now witnessing for the first time in years an increase in the incidence of low-birthweight cases and other related medical problems. This trend must be reversed. I commend the Minnesota Coalition on Health for their foresight in producing this comprehensive report.

LAWRENCE A. UZZELL ON OIL IMPORT FEE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article by Lawrence Uzzell of the Scripps Howard News Service.

The Consumer Federation of America claims that imposing a $10-a-barrel oil import fee would effectively eliminate 500,000 jobs to foreign competition, increase inflation 1 to 2 percent and decrease GNP $50 billion a year.

Using an import fee to reduce the deficit clearly would not work. The deficit must continue to be attacked on the spending side. Easy targets like the large and visible oil industry should not be the test for new taxes.

However neat and easy the oil import fee appears, it is wrong and I urge my colleagues to give careful consideration to the following.

BEWARE THE TAX QUACKS

(By Lawrence A. Uzzell)

Imagine a doctor who always prescribes the same drug, for all patients and all diseases. Imagine that he gets a commission from the drug's sales, but insists his only concern is his patients' health.

In the 1970s, America got sick from soaring energy prices. Washington's doctors, led by Jimmy Carter and John Anderson, prescribed higher energy taxes.

Today, energy prices are falling. Many of Washington's doctors say it's time for a bold new policy: Hike energy taxes.

You have to admire the tax quacks' ingenuity. When prices were rising, they said tax hikes on oil imports or retail gasoline sales would promote conservation. With prices falling, they say tax hikes would be "painless" to consumers. Someday they will find a rationale for tax hikes when prices are stable, guaranteeing they will never lack an excuse to loot the rest of us.

If Congressmen sincerely believed a new energy tax would be painless, they would not be bickering about how to do it. Senator Lloyd Bentsen, D-Tex., whose constitutents drive long distances and use domestic oil, favors a new tax on imported oil but opposes higher retail taxes on gasoline sales. Rhode Island's Senator Claiborne Pell wants the opposite: His voters drive less but need imported oil to heat their homes and factories.

Though understandably fond of such regional warfare, both Senators should know better. No matter how cleverly crafted, any new tax on energy will hurt both Texas and Rhode Island, and every other state as well. Any policy that raises the cost of manufacturing products in one region hurts consumers elsewhere. Anything that raises the cost of shipping products between regions hurts consumers everywhere.

Thus, according to a study by the Consumer Federation of America, a $10 per barrel levy on imported oil would boost inflation by 1 or 2 percent, lower the gross national product by about $50 billion, and wipe out half a million jobs.

The tax quacks say energy prices are falling anyway, so a new tax that merely keeps them stable wouldn't hurt. To appreciate the absurdity of this logic, apply it to other goods. For example, the real (inflation-adjusted) price of food has gone down every year since 1978. Prices of high-tech products like computers have dropped even faster. If Congress had taxed away such consumer "windfalls" as fast as they appeared, it would have choked not just every consumer's standard of living but every producer's incentives for innovation.

Like it or not, to penalize efficiency and abundance is to encourage stagnation and scarcity. Though in the short run, such penalties may seem painless, they are never harmless.

But unlike real doctors, the tax quacks would rather avoid pain than harm. Their ideal tax system would be omnipresent but invisible, siphoning wealth into the public sector in ways the private sector wouldn't even notice. That's why they howled so when President Reagan got Congress to index tax rates to inflation, eliminating the back-door tax hikes that mounted so rapidly in the 1970s. That's why so many of them are attracted to the oil import tax, which consumers would feel

But after a month of waffling, Reagan has finally announced he will oppose this tax. That decision leaves the high-tax lobby only one surviving hope for a new energy levy: the retail gasoline tax preferred by Senator Pell and the editors of the New York Times.

The Times admits such a tax would be "highly visible," but claims "it would not discriminate against any region." Many drivers outside the compact northeast would disagree, but let that pass: The critical flaw of the gasoline tax is that it discriminates against the poor.

An extra tax of 25 cents per gallon would add about $140 to the annual cost of driving a car. That's $280 for a two-car family, more if its adults have to drive to work. BMW owners don't consider that a lot of money. Drivers of third-hand Pintos feel differently. But both would pay the same amount.

For decades, the high-tax lobby has argued that the tax system should be "progressive," taking a higher percentage of rich people's earnings than of others'. A gasoline tax, like any sales tax on non-luxury items, would do precisely the opposite.

The challenge of economic policy is to reconcile growth with fairness. The tax quacks' latest medicine would poison both.

APPROVE THE McCLURE-VOLKMER BILL

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to offer for consideration a resolution approved by the Arizona State House of Representatives urging the U.S. House of Representatives to approve the McClure-Volkmer bill.

I am a cosponsor of H.R. 945, the Firearms Owners Protection Act, and I support passage of the Volkmer substitute. I encourage my colleagues to do the same.

AFL-CIO MEMBERS TO RECEIVE LOW-INTEREST CREDIT CARDS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, for the past year I have been pushing for the enactment of my bill, H.R. 1197, to cap credit card interest rates at lower levels than presently exist. The reason for this legislation is simple. While all other interest rates are dropping to new record lows, credit card rates remain at record high levels.

This consumer injustice was highlighted on March 7, when the Federal Reserve Board announced a half-point drop in the discount rate, what banks pay to borrow money from the Fed, from 7.5 to 7 percent. It should be noted that the Fed's bank borrowing rate has been cut in half since 1981, from 14 percent, but none of that savings has been passed on to bank card holders. In fact, credit card interest rates have actually gone up since 1981 and for only one apparent reason—greed on the part of the banks.

A recent survey I conducted showed that 9 of the Nation's 10 largest bank issuers of credit cards had significant earnings increases in 1985. This should not come as any surprise. After all, these same banks are charging their credit card customers an average of 19.37 percent interest, which is nearly a 200-percent markup on what it costs them to borrow the same money from the Fed. That is gouging, pure and simple, and it is a national disgrace.

My bill would cap credit card interest rates at 5 percentage points above the Federal Reserve's discount rate. That would result in a 12-percent interest cap under present conditions.

Critics of a federally mandated credit card interest cap make two basic arguments. First, they point to continued consumer use of credit cards and say that consumers do not mind paying high interest rates on credit cards. Second, they argue that credit card issuers cannot make a profit if the rates they charge are lowered.

I have presented detailed testimony showing the flawed logic behind these arguments and I do not think it necessary to repeat those statements at this time. However, I would like to insert an article that recently appeared in the AFL-CIO News. Significantly, this article reports that the Bank of New York has offered to provide low-interest credit cards to AFL-CIO union members. The article included a statement by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland that "our surveys of union members showed that one of the benefits they most wanted to see sponsored by the labor movement was a credit card that would save them money compared with the usual cards issued by banks."

This statement, along with the fact that Bank of New York was willing to offer a credit card at a rate of about 14.5 percent, tells us two things. First, consumers do mind paying high interest rates on credit cards. Second, credit card issuers apparently can make a profit when offering lower rates.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert the AFL-CIO News Article.

The article follows:

[From the AFL-CIO News, Mar. 1, 1986]

CREDIT CARD PLAN APPROVED AS PART OF BENEFITS PACKAGE

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has reached an agreement on a plan that will enable union members to obtain low-cost credit cards. Starting in early summer, the Bank of New York will issue the new MasterCard through unions affiliated with the federation.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland announced the agreement on the final day of the Executive Council's winter meeting here. He said the credit card plan represents another step in fulfilling recommendations of the council's Committee on the Evolution of Work to create a new form of worker benefit for union members.

"Our surveys of union members showed that one of the benefits they most wanted to see sponsored by the labor movement was a credit card that would save them money compared with the usual cards issued by banks," Kirkland said.

"We believe that this card will be the best deal of its kind for American consumers."

Unions affiliated with the federation will be able to choose either of two plans to offer their members. The new cards will call for no fee on issuance. Under one option, card holders will pay interest on their balances from the time of purchase at a rate 5 percent above the bank prime rate, or 14.5 percent at the present time. The other option provides for a slightly higher rate on unpaid balances after an initial grace period of no interest payments.

The average bank credit card now requires interest payments at rates of 19 percent or more, despite a general decline in other rates. Annual fees for the cards average $20.

The AFL-CIO credit card plan was applauded by the Bankcard Holders of America as a "bold move." Elgie Holstein, associate director of the non-profit educational organization, said it "sends a strong signal to the banking industry that working people are fed up with high credit card interest rates."

During the council meeting, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who is chairman of the Committee on the Evolution of Work, reported on other steps being taken to carry out its recommendations. He said the new low-cost credit card is one element of a package of benefits the committee hopes to have ready by the next council meeting, May 13-14, in Washington. Also being developed are forms of group health and life insurance, a legal aid plan, and an investment and savings instrument.

After the package has been offered to the 13.1 million members of AFL-CIO affiliates through their unions, it will be made available to individuals who express interest in joining a new form of associate membership with unions.

The credit card agreement was reached with the Bank of New York and Affinity Group Marketing Inc. after they submitted the most favorable bid for the plan. Donald Colby, senior vice president of the bank, and David Mann, representing AGM, negotiated the final terms with AFL-CIO officials.

THEATER OF THE ABSURD

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the President's speech in support of aid to the Nicaraguan Contras this Sunday, I became very upset. The President, trying to sell a foreign policy which Americans simply don't support, tries to frighten and anger us with names like the ayatollah, the Red Brigade, and Colonel Qadhafi.

Distortions and emotionally charged words are not a substitute for open and rational debate.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial from today's San José Mercury News which clearly and accurately describes the degeneration of the debate surrounding this question.

The text follows:

[From San José (CA) Mercury News, Mar. 18, 1986]

THEATER OF THE ABSURD

REAGAN'S FUSILLADE OF EXAGGERATIONS WAS AIMED AT SCARING CONGRESS

The debate over the funding of the Nicaraguan Contras has now turned into such a gross burlesque of fact that it has ceased to be a debate at all. It is a fusillade of exaggerations and distortions the likes of which this country has not heard since the Vietnam war.

President Reagan's performance on television Sunday night had nothing to do with defending policy based on a reasoned presentation of evidence and options. It was demagoguery at its worst, with one aim in mind: scaring—not persuading—members of the House of Representatives into supporting his aid package for the Contras during this week's vote.

Distortions tend to produce counterdistortions, and predictably some group called the Emergency Committee Against Contra Funding was at it Monday, with full-page newspaper ads every bit as distorted as the president's speech.

This is not how policy is made. Some of the tricks Reagan used Sunday night would make the presidents he evoked—Washington, Lincoln, Truman, Kennedy—blush. To tie the fate of the Western hemisphere to a ragtag band of revolutionaries in Nicaragua is rubbish.

The president of the United States should set the tone for national security debates and if he sets the right tone, he will find, as Sen. Henry Jackson once said, that the best politics is no politics.

But when using hyperbole and half-truths, he tries to intimidate the nation and Congress into a course of action over which both have deep doubts, then the president can and should expect a rebuff.

There was hardly a buzzword the president left out of his tirade Sunday: Khaddafi, the Ayatollah, the PLO, the Red Brigades, terrorists, red tide, drug trafficking, Soviet bases, severed ears, the fall of Mexico, East Germans, North Koreans. The speech had everything but a raped nun.

But the core argument was caricutural. The existence of the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua threatens the hemisphere and imperils the United States. Said Reagan:

"Using Nicaragua as a base, the Soviets and Cubans can become the dominant power in the crucial corridor between North and South America. Established there, they will be in a position to threaten the Panama Canal, interdict our vital Caribbean sea lanes and, ultimately move against Mexico. Should that happen, desperate Latin peoples by the millions would begin fleeing north into the cities of the southern United States."

This is not only the domino reincarnated, it is reasoning run amok. If the Contras were all that stood between us and that, we not only ought to fund them but all rush down to the jungles to join them. And we expect the Mexicans and a few others would be right there with us.

The United States must do what is necessary to protect its security. It always has, though in modern times it has had a tendency to define its security interests somewhat loosely, from Chile to Vietnam, passing through Lebanon, Angola and Afghanistan on the way.

But to have reached a point where the fate of the hemisphere lies in the hands of a backward nation of 8 million Nicaraguans is to defy even the most generous definition of national security.

The solution to the Nicaraguan problem is not the Contras. Aid to the Contras delays the solution since it legitimizes foreign intervention. The solution is a negotiated settlement that bans foreign troops from the region and incursions by one country into another.

With such an agreement, which is what the Contadora nations are working for, Nicaragua would be free to be Nicaragua—within its own borders.

Most Americans, most Congressmen, would settle for that, and Reagan knows it. Sunday, in an attempt to force a futile and unpopular policy on the country, the president went too far. It is time to let him know that we're not buying.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES—A NATIONAL TRAGEDY

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, in Sunday's edition of the Washington Post appeared an article that confirmed our suspicions regarding the mortgage default rate. Home foreclosures in the United States is near record rates and even though interest rates are declining, there is little sign of a slowdown in mortgage defaults. Americans are still losing their homes.

At the end of January, nearly 175,000 foreclosed homes were in the inventories of the Veterans' Administration, Department of Housing and Urban Development, and two large secondary mortgage corporations. Surely, there must be an alternative to throwing American families out of their homes. This is an American tragedy and a disgrace.

I have introduced legislation that may have prevented the foreclosure of some of these homes. I ask that my colleagues read the following article and look at my bill, H.R. 3306, the Emergency Home Foreclosure Relief Act. This could just be the program we need to reverse this dangerous trend of record high foreclosures.

The article follows:

FORECLOSURES IN UNITED STATES NEAR RECORD RATE—LITTLE SIGN OF SLOWDOWN AS SALES BOOM

(By Ann Mariano)

Hundreds of houses went on the auction block across the country last month and thousands more were sold individually by private lenders and federal agencies as near-record numbers of Americans continued to lose their homes through foreclosures.

Dozens more auctions are scheduled in coming months as the Veterans Administration, the Department of Housing and Urban Development and private lenders press to sell the properties quickly, hoping to cut their losses as much as possible. The cost of acquiring and maintaining the properties runs into billions of dollars annually.

Nearly 175,000 foreclosed homes were in the inventories of the VA, HUD and two large secondary mortgage corporation at the end of January, spokesmen estimated. Institutions insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. hold about $5 billion worth of foreclosed residential property, according to Federal Home Loan Bank Board figures. The insurance agency itself holds $330 million in property acquired from failed thrift institutions, a spokesman said. Agencies and lenders estimate their losses range as high as 30 percent of their investments.

The foreclosures remain at high levels while declining interest rates are boosting housing sales in many parts of the nation. Despite the booming real estate market, however, there is little sign of a slowdown in mortgage defaults. HUD could accumulate more than 40,000 foreclosed properties this year, according to James C. Nistler, the agency's deputy assistant secretary for single-family housing.

Foreclosures peaked in early 1985, then flattened out, "but unfortunately, they are not going down," said Richard H. Daniel, senior vice president for regional activities with the Federal National Mortgage Association. Increasing defaults in states hurt by falling energy prices are offsetting any decline in foreclosures rooted in the inflationary ups and downs of the early 1980s, he said.

"There is a lot of concern about the price of oil," Daniel said. Economic conditions "are not going to get better, and they could get better, and they could get worse in the energy states," particularly Texas, where unemployment is inching upward. Fannie Mae, and federally chartered corporation, buys mortgages from lenders and sells them, or securities backed by them, on the secondary market as a way to provide cash for new loans.

Houston, with an economy heavily dependent on the oil industry, has one of the country's highest foreclosure rates. A major auction of several hundred houses was held there during each week of February, and more are planned. Overbuilt markets have contributed to the high number of foreclosures throughout the Sun Belt, and the declining fortunes of farmers and heavy industry have boosted foreclosures in the Midwest, according to a report by the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp., also a secondary mortgage market company.

Federal agencies and lenders are increasing their efforts to interest consumers in foreclosed houses. Some are hiring professional managers or beefing up their own staffs, and Fannie Mae is preparing a brochure on how to buy a foreclosed home.

Foreclosed properties may be bargains for home buyers and investors, but prospective purchaser should be cautious, according to Benny L. Kass, a D.C. real estate consumer attorney.

"You have to ask, if this [house] is such a good property, why did the owner let it go to foreclosure?" Kass said. In addition, "People ought to realize that just because the government [VA or FHA] is selling a house to you, it doesn't mean it's in good shape." Usually, a homeowner facing foreclosure will "strip out everything he can" from a house.

Kass advises propsective purchasers to do a "lot of homework" on property values in the neighborhood, whether values are going up, what the rental market is like, and to inspect the property carefully, preferably with professional assistance.

The VA and HUD's Federal Housing Administration, which insure home loans, acquire the properties after paying claims to lenders when homeowners default on their mortgages. The agencies and lenders try to recover as much of their costs as possible through sale of the foreclosed properties, but lose millions in high carrying costs, low sales prices and other expenses, they said.

HUD, for example, estimates that its average loss per house is $17,800, of which $12,450 "is due to expenses in acquiring, holding and selling the property," said Janet Hale, then general deputy assistant secretary for housing, in testimony before a House subcommittee last December.

The department acquired about 38,000 houses through foreclosure in fiscal year 1985, which ended last Sept. 30, sold about the same number and ended the year with another 16,700 properties still on hand, a HUD spokesman said. At the end of January, HUD's inventory had risen to 19,000 homes. In fiscal 1984, HUD took in 33,000 houses and sold 38,000.

At the end of January, the VA owned 18,783 properites and was in the process of acquiring another 14,809, according to R.J. Vogel, the VA's chief benefits director. In March 1984, the agency's inventory reached its high point—22,316 properties, said Vogel, who also testified before a House subcommittee last week. The agency sold 28,500 foreclosed properties in fiscal 1985. Vogel said the VA's present inventory is valued at about $787 million, and a spokesman said HUD's inventory is worth about $627.5 million.

WALL STREET JOURNAL ON ATBM SYSTEM FOR ALLIES

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, as the following Wall Street Journal editorial notes, our European Allies are preparing to put SDI words into concrete actions:

American critics spin their intellectual wheels attacking the most advanced, visionary aspects (of the SDI program). The Europeans are getting on with the practical uses of defensive systems.

Our NATO Allies face the full spectrum of Soviet offensive threats—nuclear, chemical, and high explosive conventional weapons—perched atop increasingly accurate ballistic missiles that can threaten the entire depth of the NATO forces. In the Middle East, Israel faces similar threats from Soviet SRBM's, presently deployed in Syria but capable of wide movement.

Unencumbered by the ABM Treaty, our allies are proceeding with work aimed at deploying effective, nonnuclear defenses against Soviet ballistic missiles. Judging by the near-hysterical Soviet reaction to this development, our friends may be on to something which we would do well to emulate.

The editorial follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 13, 1986]

A NEW SDI PERSPECTIVE

The Star Wars debate is coming down to earth. West Germany's minister of defense, Manfred Woerner, has just announced that he would like to see the creation of an active, nonnuclear-missile defense system for Europe. Mr. Woerner's ideas are contained in the important article written for the current issue of Strategic Review. "A defense against attacking missiles," Mr. Woerner writes, "is consistent with—indeed, reinforcive of—the defensive cast of the NATO alliance."

With this public commitment, Mr. Woerner has brought into the open a growing movement in Europe to build support and credibility for a European variant of President Reagan's strategic defense initiative (SDI). It would involve using advanced technologies in the near future to defend particular geographic regions—as opposed to the entire world—against the Soviet Union's rapidly developing offensive missile systems.

The difference in the way Americans and Europeans are addressing the SDI debate now is instructive. American critics spin their intellectual wheels, attacking the most advanced, visionary aspects. The Europeans are getting on with the practical uses of defensive systems.

The military imperatives driving the concerns of Mr. Woerner and other Europeans are easy to understand. Put simply, missile technology is becoming extremely accurate. Opponents of SDI often equate ballistic missiles with an indiscriminate nuclear holocaust across great distances. That is theoretically possible, but it is no longer the only possibility. The Europeans understand that the missiles that the Soviet Union placed in Eastern Europe in 1984 have firing ranges of between 90 miles and 550 miles and that in coming years these missiles will be able to land within 100 to 200 feet of their targets. Soviet efforts to dramatically improve guidance systems aren't intended to blow Bonn, Paris, London or Rome. They are intended to perform what is known as "defense busting."

Defense busting involves destroying or disabling NATO's military installations—airfields, command headquarters, highways, radar and the like—leaving Europe vulnerable to the superior numbers of the Warsaw Pact's conventional forces. An important attraction of using short-range missiles for this purpose (a development largely unreported to the general public) is that it can be done with nonnuclear, or conventional, warheads. From the Soviets' perspective, the case for using conventionally armed missiles is that they reduce, if not eliminate, NATO's incentive to respond by launching a disproportionately destructive nuclear strike. Using missiles for conventional military objectives also keeps the Soviets' bomber forces (and their theater nuclear weapons) in reserve and intact.

Ironically, one of the most intriguing aspects of Mr. Woerner's proposal is that it could break Europeans free of the constraints of the 1972 ABM treaty signed by the U.S. and Soviet Union. While the most expansive interpretation of the treaty's provisions has become an article of deep faith for American arms-control adherents, Europeans are beginning to doubt that the ABM treaty requires anyone to forgo defenses against nonnuclear Soviet missiles carrying out nonnuclear missions. Moreover, with the likely delivery of precision missile systems to unfriendly countries—Syria, for example—governments such as Israel's are expressing an active interest in advanced missile defenses.

Recent reports have suggested that disagreements have arisen between the Americans and West Germans over the manner in which responsibilities will be divided for developing SDI-related technologies. Given the commitment both sides have to the principle of building anti-missile defenses, it's likely these differences will be resolved. If on the other hand the U.S. initiative becomes bogged down in Congress, Mr. Woerner suggests Europe may have to leave the Americans to their endless debates and proceed on its own with the first stages of a missile defense system. "Given the imminent [Soviet] threat that has been described," Mr. Woerner writes, "it is imperative to proceed with the building blocks of an anti-missile defense in Europe irrespective of the ultimate decisions that may be made in the United States with respect to SDI." The more the merrier, we say.

CONGRESS SHOULD REJECT CONTRA AID

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has formally requested that Congress approve his request for $100 million in United States aid for the Contras who are seeking to overthrow the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. To date, two out of three congressional committees which have considered the President's request have rejected it. The House should follow suit when it considers this measure on March 19.

Last week, White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan suggested in an article published in the Washington Post that a vote against aid for the Contras was tantamount to a vote for the Sandinistas and communism. Mr. Buchanan went on at some length to impugn the motives and patriotism of Democrats who have been critical of the President's policy toward Nicaragua.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that Mr. Buchanan has resorted to such extreme hyperbole is perhaps a measure of just how unsuccessful the Reagan administration has been in convincing the American public and Congress that its policy has merit. The fact that the administration has dropped the ball on the Contadora peace process, which is still today the only multilateral effort designed to promote a peaceful political settlement of our differences with the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. The President suggests that the only alternative to support the Contras is to allow all of Latin America to be consumed by Communist expansion. It should be objectively clear to everyone that opposition to the President's obsession with providing military aid to the Contras is not an unequivocal endorsement of the Sandinista government. I deplore the violations of human rights and restictions upon freedom of the press and civil liberties which have occurred in Nicaragua. But we must resist the temptation to throw fuel on the fire.

Congress should reject the President's proposal for $100 million in aid to the Contras because it pursues a policy which will fail miserably. In 5 years of resistance, the Contras are farther from achieving their real goal—the overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua—than ever before. Instead, we must rethink U.S. policy in terms of positive diplomacy. We must find ways to work cooperatively as a partner for peaceful change in Central America without escalating military confrontation and violence. Nicaragua's neighbors in Central America understand this reality better than anyone else. That is why they are opposed to the President's proposal for aid to the Contras. That is why they have asked and pleaded with the Reagan administration to rejoin the Contadora process as an active and interested party seeking to minimize a military confrontation rather than promoting one.

Ironically, the administration chooses to hear a contradictory message, diametrically different than what the leaders of Central and South America are saying.

The following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor (March 7) states the case for rejecting the Reagan administration request for $100 million in aid to the Contras well. Hopefully, Congress will act accordingly on March 20.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Mar. 7, 1986]

HOLD OUT AGAINST "CONTRA" AID

The resistance to President Reagan's requests for military aid for the Nicaragua "contras" is well founded. This resistance—in Congress, and among other countries in the region—should continue.

Overall, the administration's request for $100 million for the contras, mostly for arms, casts the United States, in the eyes of Congress and the region, as the fomenters of a new round of aggression in an area that has reached relative stability in recent months.

The Reagan administration does not put it this way. It prefers to warn that, without the aid to the Nicaraguan rebels, Managua will become a second Cuba, a "permanent staging ground for terrorism." Defense Secretary Weinberger warns that if the US does not send aid now, one day it may have to send in the troops. And so on.

Even with increased aid, can the contras, whose active numbers have dwindled to about 6,000, or one-tenth those of the Sandinista Army, pressure the Nicaraguan government to make the political and diplomatic concessions the administration wants?

Hardly. Even with the full aid package, the rebel troops could not overthrow the Marxist-led Sandinistas. Nor would any amount of contra aid likely compel Managua to yield. The Sandinistas have long viewed the rebels, many of whom are supporters of former dictator Somoza, as US proxies, trained and financed by the Central Intelligence Agency.

This lack of credibility has largely led House panels already to vote down the aid request. There are other factors that fuel this lack of enthusiasm: this week's GAO report that the administration has lacked controls over much of the humanitarian aid given the contras over the last year, longtime concern over CIA meddling in affairs Nicaraguan, from mining of harbors to training of the anti-Sandinista forces; and reservations about this country's role in the increasing militarization of the region.

The Reagan administration wants close to $800 million in fiscal year 1986 for security assistance (a combination of military and economic aid) to governments in the region. In Honduras the US has helped build 11 airfields and six military bases in the last three years, which appear to be more permanent than temporary. Also, the US regularly shuttles thousands of National Guard troops into and out of Honduras to do construction work and take part in joint military exercises.

Many in Congress see the contra aid, not as an alternative to committing US troops, but as a magnet bound one day to pull US troops in—one more step down "the slippery slope of involvement," as Rep. David Obey (D) of Wisconsin puts it.

The administration is trying to steamroller its way over such concerns by essentially portraying aid opponents as brainwashed by the clever lobbying efforts of the Sandinistas. For its part, the White House continues to balk at suggestions that it talk directly with the Sandinistas. It apparently views as weakness what many see as an act of statesmanship. The US insists that Managua must also talk with the contras. The Sandinistas will talk with the US but not the rebels. It is a classic Catch-22 standoff not worth $100 million to resolve.

Nicaragua's neighbors, including several fragile new democracies, are concerned both about the threat from a Sandinista government interested in exporting revolution and about the military buildup in their midst. Accordingly, they do not encourage the US to increase contra aid. They would much prefer to see Washington press harder on the diplomatic front. Indeed, Costa Rica, which has publicly criticized US aid to the contras, is now drafting a joint border-inspection agreement with the Sandinistas.

The best hope for a peaceful, equitable, and legal solution to the dilemma is to resume bilateral talks with Managua. And Washington should take an active role in the Contadora process.

Choosing cooperation, patience, and diplomacy over a narrow, precipitous military course that cannot succeed is more likely to increase American influence in the region.

THE FINDINGS OF THE CONGRESS ON THE SITUATION IN NICARAGUA

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua continues to rule with a brutal iron hand and continues its efforts to destabilize neighboring nations. The Congress of the United States has found this to be consistently true for years, yet some still fail to recognize the importance of pressuring the Sandinistas to cease their repression and subversion. The official historical record established by the Congress on the nature of the Sandinista regime and its activities could not be more stark.

On March 4, 1982, the then chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence made a statement about the insurgency in El Salvador:

There is further persuasive evidence that the Sandinista government of Nicaragua is helping train insurgents and is transferring arms and financial support from and through Nicaragua to the insurgents. They are further providing the insurgents bases of operations in Nicaragua. Cuban involvement—especially in providing arms—is also evident.

What this says is that, contrary to the repeated denials of Nicaragua officials, that country is thoroughly involved in supporting the Salvadoran insurgency. That support is such as to greatly aid the insurgents in their struggle with government forces in El Salvador.

On September 22, 1982, the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence released a staff report which stated, page 3, that "intelligence has been able to establish beyond doubt the involvement of Communist countries in the Salvadoran insurgency."

On May 13, 1983, the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence issued a report (H. Rept. 98–122, part 1, page 6) stating that:

At the time of the filing of this report, the Committee believes that the intelligence available to it continues to support the following judgments with certainty:

A major portion of the arms and other material sent by Cuba and other Communist countries to the Salvadoran insurgents transits Nacaragua with the permission and assistance of the Sandinistas.

The Salvadoran insurgents rely on the use of sites in Nacaragua, some of which are located in Managua itself, for communications, command-and-control, and for the logistics to conduct their financial, material and propaganda activities.

The Sandinista leadership sanctions and directly facilitates all of the above functions.

Nicaragua provides a range of other support activities, including secure transit of insurgents to and from Cuba, and assistance to the insurgents in planning their activities in El Salvador.

In addition, Nicaragua and Cuba have provided—and appear to continue providing—training to the Salvadoran insurgents.

Cuban and Sandinista political support for the Salvadoran insurgents has been unequivocable for years. The committee concludes that similarly strong military support has been the hidden compliment of overt support.

The committee further stated in its report of May 13, 1983 that:

Another area of serious concern to the committee is the significant military buildup going on in Nicaragua. . . . Considering the small population of Nicaragua—2½ million people—and its weakened economic status—such a buildup cannot be explained away as solely defensive. Within the Central America isthmus, it poses a potential threat to its neighbors.

On December 9, 1983, the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1984 (Public Law 98–215) became law. Section 109(a)(1) of that act stated:

SEC. 109. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of National Reconstruction in Nicaragua has failed to keep solemn promises, made to the Organization of America States in July 1979, to establish full respect for human rights and political liberties, hold early elections, preserve a private sector, permit political pluralism, and pursue a foreign policy of nonaggression and nonintervention;

On August 8, 1985, the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (Public Law 99–83) became law. Section 722(c)(2)–(4) of that act—the very act under which the President made his pending request for aid for the Nicaraguan resistance that the Michel-Murtha resolution would approve—states in part:

"(2) THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA.—The Congress further finds that—

(C) the Government of National Reconstruction, now known as the Government of Nicaragua and controlled by the Frente Sandinista (the FSLN), has flagrantly violated the provisions of the June 23, 1979, resolution, the rights of the Nicaraguan people, and the security of the nations in the region, in that it—

(i) no longer inlcudes the democratic members of the Government of National Reconstruction in the political process;

(ii) is not a government freely elected under conditions of freedom of the press, assembly and organization, and is not recognized as freely elected by its neighbors, Costa Rica, Honduras, and El Salvador;

(iii) has taken significant steps towards establishing a totalitarian Communist dictatorship, inlcuding the formation of FSLN neighborhood watch committees and the enactment of laws that violate human rights and grant undue executive power;

(iv) has committed atrocities against its citizens as documented in reports by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the Organization of American States;

(v) has aligned itself with the Soviet Union and Soviet allies, including the German Democratic Republic, Bulgaria, Libya, and the Palestine Liberation Organization;

(vi) has committed and refuses to cease aggression in the form of armed subversion against its neighbors in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, the Charter of the Organization of American States, the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, and the 1965 United Nations General Assembly Declaration on Intervention; and

(vii) has built up an army beyond the needs of immediate self-defense, at the expense of the needs of the Nicaraguan people and about which the nations of the region has expressed deepest concern.

(3) THE NICARAGUAN DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION.—The Congress further finds that—

(A) as a result of these violations, the Government of Nicaragua has lost the support of virtually all independent sectors of Nicaraguan society who initially supported the removal of the Somoza regime (including democratic political parties of the left, center, and right; the leadership of the Church; free unions; and the business, farmer, and professional sectors) and who still seek democracy, reject the rule of the Frente Sandinista, and seek the free elections promised in 1979;

(B) the Nicaraguan political opposition has joined with the armed opposition groups in issuing the San Jose Manifesto of March 1, 1985, calling for a national dialog under mediation by the Nicaraguan Bishops Conference to peacefully attain the fulfillment of the Government of Nicaragua's commitments to the Organization of American States, including "the democratization of Nicaragua, conscious that democracy is the only means to carry out an authentic revolution and secure our national identity and sovereignty."

(C) on June 12, 1985, in San Salvador, El Salvador, the political and armed opposition groups representing the entire democratic political spectrum of Nicaragua formed the Unified Nicaraguan Opposition and affirmed their "historical commitment to achieve for Nicaragua the reconciliation of her children, to establish the foundation for democracy and the moral and material reconstruction of the nation;" and

(D) the Unified Nicaraguan Opposition further declared its intention to "give priority at all times to a political solution which will ease the suffering of our people."

(4) CONCERNS IN THE REGION AND UNITED STATES RESPONSIBILITIES.—The Congress further finds that—

(A) Nicaragua's neighbors, Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Honduras, have expressed, individually and through the Contadora process, their belief that their peace and freedom is not safe so long as the Government of Nicaragua excludes from power most of Nicaragua's political leadership and is controlled by a small sectarian party, without regard to the will of the majority of Nicaraguans; and

(B) the United States, given its role in the installation of the current Government of Nicaragua, has a special responsibility regarding the implementation of the commitments made by that Government in 1979, especially to those who fought against Somoza to bring democracy to Nicaragua with United States support.

The Congress has found that the Sandinista regime flagrantly abuses the people of Nicaragua and works to foment subversion in democratically elected neighboring countries. The Congress should couple its perceptive statements on the situation in Nicaragua with a willingness to act.

The House should approve the Michel-Murtha Resolution—House Joint Resolution 540—to provide for effective assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

VOTING RECORD

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of the Second Congressional District of Arizona have a right to know where I stand on the issues decided by this body, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. RONALD E. McNAIR

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, one of the most gratifying aspects of my public service has been the opportunity it has afforded me to help our young gifted youth. After all, our children and their children are America's future. In 1977, one such talented individual was brought to my attention by Bob Maloney, who was a member of my staff at that time. The young man's name was Dr. Ronald E. McNair. Dr. McNair asked me to support his application to NASA for the position of mission specialists. I was extremely impressed with Ron's qualifications, particularly his commitment to serve his country and help his fellow man. I gladly supported his application and asked my distinguished colleagues former Representative Yvonne Burke and Senator Edward Brooke to join me. The rest is history.

Mr. Speaker, Ron's passing has saddened and touched us all. Bob Maloney, his friend, has written a personal tribute to Dr. Ronald E. McNair. I am most pleased to share it with you.

RON MCNAIR—AN AMERICAN HERO

When the Challenger Space Shuttle burst into flames on Tuesday, January 28, 1986, seven American heroes were killed. We as Americans grieve for them. We also grieve for their families. We feel great pain for this tragedy. I knew one of the Mission Specialists very well. I considered him a friend, a teacher and a confidant. His name was Dr. Ronald E. McNair—"Ron".

I first met Ron in November 1973. I was in my last year at Harvard Law School and he was in the middle of his work toward a Doctorate in Physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He taught karate in the basement of a small black church—St. Paul's AME. The congregation was headed by a progressive Minister named Reverend Bryant. Reverend Bryant encouraged community participation in uplifting and positive activities, Ron's Karate class was consistent with Reverend Bryant's positive philosophy. It was uplifting, spirited and represented the Puritan ethic. You worked hard, received no breaks and earned your stripes. Ron usually started class with 100 to 200 jumping jacks, followed by Marine-type calisthenics. He stressed repetition, perfection and discipline. The result was character building. He was particularly good with children. He had a certain level of compassion. Often he would tailor the drills to their abilities. The results were impressive. When St. Paul's AME Karate-Do (as we were called) competed in tournaments we always brought back the "hardware" . . . the trophies. The biggest winners were the little kids. Of course, Ron won also. You see he was one of the best at Karate. In fact, he later became New England Middle Weight Champion. What was gratifying to Ron was not his victories or how many trophies we won, but did we represent ourselves in a manner that would bring pride and good will to St. Paul's? Did we support ourselves as a family? Did we shake the hand of our competitors whether we won or lost? For Ron what was important was not our physical prowess, but our strength of character. We were family. Nothing epitomized this more than our raising money for the entry fee for tournaments. Ron suggested we sponsor a car wash on Saturdays in the parking lot of St. Paul's. The funds earned would pay the entry fee for those who could not afford it. Picture this, Saturday morning, bright and early, you had a doctoral student at M.I.T., an M.I.T. Professor, Michael Feld and his twin sons, community residents and church patrons all washing, drying and vacuuming cars to earn an entry fee. Well, we earned the money and made the trip to the tournament. All because we were family. All brought together by Ron. You see, Ron inspired people before he was an astronaut. He also had a dazzling record of personal achievement before he became an astronaut.

Consider these accomplishments. Aside from establishing St. Paul AME Karate-Do, which still flourishes, Ron received his PhD degree from M.I.T. In 1976. He was an expert in laser physics, already publishing pioneering scientific papers. He was a Presidential Scholar, a Ford Foundation Fellow, National Fellowship Fund Fellow, and NATO Fellow. Ron found time to play saxaphone. Earlier, he metriculated at North Carolina A&T State University, where he graduated magna cum laude. Here he developed his keen interest in physics and karate. These interests won him science fair awards and over 30 tournament titles. In high school he was class valedictorian and most valuable player in football and track. You see, before Ron entered the space program, he was a positive role model.

I spoke to Ron after he left M.I.T. and moved to Hughes Research Laboratories in 1977. He said the day-to-day work of a scientist was mentally stimulating, but not challenging. He mentioned he was applying for the mission specialist position in the NASA space program. He knew he had worked hard and had sound academic credentials. He also knew he was a fine-tuned athlete. This was not boast, this was fact. He also knew he feared very little. His self confidence was based on his mental discipline, meticulous preparation, strong family background and intrinsic faith in God. Ron had a keen sense of purpose.

I asked Ron how I could help. You see Ron was family. Ron was my teacher. He was my Sensei (Japanese for master instructor). From this relationship was forged a bond. I wanted to help Ron. At that time, I worked on Capitol Hill. I know he was imminently qualified and that NASA would make its decision based on merit, but I still felt recommendations from key Members of Congress would round out his application. He deferred to my judgment and asked me to proceed. The response to Ron was gratifying. Based on his qualifications, recommendations were easy to secure. Reps. Louis Stokes, Yvonne Burke and Senator Ed Brooks all supported him. This was an impressive group. Ron later thanked them all personally. He also thanked me. This was really not necessary because I was trying to repay him for all that he had given me. He sent me a picture of himself in his full astronaut regalia and inscribed it "We planned, fought and we won. Thanks, one day I hope I can be as helpful to you as you have been to me, Hang tuff, Ron. . . ."

Ron owed me nothing but this was classic Ron—humble in victory always sharing the glory.

After Ron's acceptance into the program, there was a time of excitement in his life, national medical attention, and a time to study and learn his new craft. He and I would talk from time to time, but in all candor I was very sensitive to his time commitments. I did not wish to intrude. You see, Ron never changed with all the fanfare surrounding him. I would phone him about a karate tournament I planned to participate in, not realizing that in a half-hour, Ron was appearing on national television. Ron took everything in stride. I bet that Ron found as much joy in the fact I was working toward my black belt as he received from conducting a television interview. This was Ron. He used to tell me that when I would tell him about karate tournaments, he would get psyched up and go out and train harder. When he was out of shape, which was rare, he was like a wounded tiger. He was a dangerous karate fighter. When he was in shape, you were in real trouble. But it was great fun. He was a tremendous competitor . . . great gentleman, sportsman.

One year when I went to Houston, I trained with him, at Wheeler Baptist Church. Like St, Paul's, he established another church-based karate school. When I arrived at his school he introduced me. He always gave me a better introduction than I deserved, usually ending with his nickname for me "ancient warrior". After the talk was over we fought. The Puritan ethic was renewed. After we fought we bowed to each other and embraced. I asked him if I could speak to his class. I let his class know that I was a black belt today because of Ron McNair.

While I was talking I was distracted by movement. It was little Reggie. This was Ron's son. You see Ron was also a father and husband. Tonight was karate night and it was also babysitting night. Ron told me later that Reggie had even learned how to throw a side kick . . . "All by himself". Ron was so proud.

In 1983, Ron told me he was finally going up. He was so enthusiastic I thought he was already in flight. He said it was time for him to put his years of NASA training to work. His only regret was he would have to neglect his students at Wheeler Baptist Church. But he felt confident he had trained them to persevere without him. In February 1984, Ron was a member of the 10th space shuttle mission, Challenger. Students, friends, family all Americans were proud of him. He operated the ship's mechanical arm with a spacewalking astronaut riding at the end of a mechanical picking device. He also took pictures and made an in-flight movie. He would later testify before a Congressional Committee that ". . . he was fully active inside the space vehicle during the space walk outside". Ron even took his saxaphone on flight and composed a tune. A month after Ron returned, he was in Washington to testify. We went to dinner afterwards and I asked him how the shuttle ride felt and if he was scared. He told me he was not scared because he was prepared. He confided that he knew there were risks. But felt strength from his wife Cheryl, his son Reggie, and his parents in South Carolina. He also had a keen faith in God. Concerning the actual shuttle ride, he told me he felt like he was in an "egg-beater". He loved every minute of it. He described the beauty of the world as it passed below him. You could see the sparkle in his eye. He also felt pride as an American. He was a part of history. I asked Ron what he planned on doing next. I suggested to him he had accomplished what many people only dream. I suggested he had a number of career options. I wanted him to run for public office. He told me his goal was to take care of his family and fly in a second mission. This was Ron. He always finished what he started.

In the months following his return, Ron and the other astronauts did a lot of traveling in a public relations capacity for NASA. Before he traveled, he told me Cheryl was pregnant and he didn't know whether it was a good idea to do too much traveling. He did not want to be far from her side. Ron loved Cheryl very much. She was a beautiful and courageous woman . . . a true pillar of strength. Reggie was Ron's pride and joy . . . his heart. The decision to travel was a very difficult one for Ron to make. I suggested that he might try to limit the distances he travelled as the delivery drew closer. But for now he should go. I told him he was a public figure and an inspiration to many people. He needed to tell his story. There might be a little child somewhere who needed to know that he or she could come from a small town in South Carolina and become an astronaut. I also suggested to Ron he was an American hero. He laughed because he looked upon his space ride as doing his job. This was Ron.

So he traveled. He was greeted by royalty and everyday people alike. He fully enjoyed the attention. He even considered boxing with a Thai boxer while representing NASA! When he told me this I just smiled. Ron loved a challenge even when he was on down time. When he returned home three very significant things happened. Ron visited the city of Chicago. He asked to speak to high school kids. The city obliged and the kids were let out of school to hear Ron. They met in a stadium. Ron electrified the crowd with stories of achievement. He challenged them to learn and study the sciences. He told them they could become astronauts if they prepared themselves academically. When the students returned to their schools, the demand for science courses was so great new science teachers had to be hired. This was Ron. He used his notoriety to motivate. The second story deals with Ron's speech before the Massachusetts Legislature. When he entered the Chamber, the legislators were milling around and not really paying attention. When he reached the podium and began to extoll the virtures of hard work, education and love for your country, they rose to their feet and gave him a standing ovation. This was Ron. He used his notoriety to motivate others for good. The third event this year was the birth of Ron's daughter, Joy. Cheryl, Ron and Reggie were so happy.

In May 1985 I visited Houston and I took Ron, Cheryl, Reggie and now Joy out to dinner. Little Reggie sat in his chair and was accepting his role as daddy's "big boy". Joy on the other hand was being what she was—a baby. Ron was cradling her in his arms. All of a sudden I heard him start to sing "ba, ba, ba, boo. . . .". Cheryl looked at me and said, "Only two things calm her, me and his singing. We laughed.

It was then he told me he was a crew member in the January 1986 shuttle mission. Ron's eyes began to sparkle and you could sense his enthusiasm. We parted that evening, shook hands embraced and gave each other a thumbs up sign. I did not realize this would be the last time we would touch. We spoke several weeks later and I told him I was fighting in tournaments and testing for my third degree black belt in December. He was very happy for me. He confided in me that he'd planned to compete in 2 or 3 karate tournaments before the January liftoff. I laughed. About a month later, he told me he competed in 3 tournaments, won first place twice and second place once. That was Ron. He was always ready, always prepared. He was a winner. Six weeks before the flight I received a call from him asking where the best place to send passes to the shuttle liftoff would be. This was our final communication.

I've taken the time to talk about Ron McNair and I encourage others to do the same because he and his fellow astronauts are American heroes. I did not know them, but I did share a portion of Ron's life. He was a scientist, athlete and musician. He was a motivator, a religious man and American hero. He went from the pride of his family in South Carolina to the Shuttle. He touched thousands of lives in a positive way. He leaves a gifted and wonderful family. For them, we offer our prayers and support. I hope schools, science departments and scholarships are named after him. I hope he receives the highest awards America can give him. He deserves them all. Physically, Ron McNair died in the Challenger tragedy on January 28, 1986, but spiritually he lives for: "A person is never truly dead until they are forgotten.".

Ron McNair must never be forgotten.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE ALFRED JAMES NORTHRUP LOCKWOOD OF NEW JERSEY—1986 RECIPIENT, DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARD—POMPTON LAKES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 22, the people of Pompton Lakes, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will assemble at the annual installation dinner of the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce to honor an esteemed businessman, community leader, and good friend—the Honorable Alfred James Northrup Lockwood of New Jersey—whose lifetime of service to the borough of Pompton Lakes and its surrounding communities has earned him the highly coveted distinguished service award of the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greetings and felicitations to him, his wife Margaret, daughters, Lynn and husband Lauren Heimall, Loren and husband Donald Mobius, son Ken and wife Patti Brannin, and grandchildren upon this milestone of achievement in their family endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce is one of our Nation's most prestigious affiliates of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. This masthead reads, "where the historic past meets the progressive future," and their organization has surely served the business community of Pompton Lakes with distinction. Alfred Lockwood has also distinguished himself in the community and has been selected by them as this year's honoree for his outstanding record of responsible service to the people of the community.

Our honoree, Al, son of Sophia and Valentine Lockwood, was born September 2, 1918 in Pompton Lakes and attended grammar and high school in Pompton Lakes. It is interesting to note that he holds the record for athletic letters earned in his high school years—13 in all. He was captain of the football team, the basketball team and baseball team. Upon his graduation from high school in 1936 he attended Wake Forest College.

The pleasure of great personal dedication and always working to the peak of one's ability with sincerity of purpose and determination to fulfill a life's dream—that's the success of the opportunity of America—and the mark of distinction in our society of "the selfmade man." Al's aspirations and successes in the mainstream of America's building and construction industry does indeed portray a great American success story.

Al left college after 1 year to seek gainful employment and worked for Dupont and other corporate enterprises before joining with his brother in 1950 to establish their own business, Lockwood Bros. It is not surprising that their industriousness was devoted to Lockwood Bros. Construction and Lockwood Bros. Realty—an integral occupation of their heritage. Commencing with his early childhood he lived for many years in the home that his grandfather had built in 1895 in Pompton Lakes and in 1950 he built his own home of residence in Pompton Lakes.

There is much that can be said about Al Lockwood and all of his good works. He received many citations of merit and honor for his many charitable and rewarding contributions to the quality of life and way of life for all of our people. Throughout his lifetime he has forged ahead with dedication, devotion, and sincerity of purpose in responding to the needs of the people of Pompton Lakes.

He served as the borough's building inspector, was a member of the zoning board and the board of adjustments of Pompton Lakes. He was chairman of the Municipal Utilities Authority, president of the Pompton Lakes Rotary Club, and Rotary district treasurer. He was chosen the Paul Harris Fellow of the Rotary Club, the highest award that Rotary can bestow upon any of its members.

As we all know, Rotary's motto is: "We make a living by what we get . . . we make a life by what we give . . . Service above self"—and their good deeds in helping others, young and adults alike have served to inspire all of us.

Among his many other civic and charitable endeavors, he is a member of the Elks Club and has served on the board of directors of the First Fidelity Bank since 1965. He is also a prominent member of the Pompton Reformed Church.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of life and way of life here in America. As we gather together on Saturday, March 22 with the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce in tribute to Al's leadership endeavors and personal commitment dedicated to service to people, we do indeed salute a great American—the 1986 recipient of the Distinguished Service Award of the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce—the Honorable Alfred James Northrup Lockwood of New Jersey.

AMERICAN TERRY ANDERSON FACING SECOND YEAR AS HOSTAGE IN LEBANON

HON. GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday marked the beginning of the second year Terry Anderson, the Associated Press bureau chief in Beirut, has been held hostage in Lebanon.

Anderson was kidnaped on his way to work on March 16, 1985.

Sunday also marked the beginning of the third year Americans have been held hostage in Lebanon. William Buckley, a U.S. foreign service officer, was kidnaped March 16, 1985

My personal friend, Father Lawrence Jenco of Joliet, IL, has been held hostage in Lebanon since January 8, 1985, 15 months ago.

The director of the American University hospital, David Jacobsen, was kidnaped May 28, 1985.

Thomas Sutherland, dean of the American University Agriculture School, has been held hostage since June 9, last year.

Sunday also marked the 462d day since the disappearance of Peter Kilborn, the American University librarian.

Mr. Speaker, three of the six Americans missing in Lebanon will soon have been held hostage longer than the 444 days of the Iran hostage crisis of 6 years ago. The hostage crisis continues. And won't be over until all Americans held in Lebanon are back in the United States, safe and sound.

THE FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY ACT OF 1986

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I join my distinguished colleagues, Congressmen SID MORRISON and AL SWIFT in introducing and cosponsoring H.R. 4394, timely and salient liability legislation.

Regardless of which State is named for these geological repositories, we have an obligation to ensure that all the citizens of our country are protected. We have an even greater responsibility to protect these chosen States and its residents in the event of a nuclear accident.

I believe the Federal Government is not acting responsibly unless it accepts unlimited liability when it is taking title to spent nuclear fuel, managing its storage and disposal, and selecting and siting permanent repository sites.

This legislation will mandate the total indemnification for public liability claims resulting from nuclear waste disposal activities.

This is an issue that transcends political and geographic barriers, and concerns the entire Nation. Thus, this legislation deserves the the attention and support of the total House of Representatives.

I thank my colleagues, Mr. MORRISON and Mr. SWIFT for their leadership on this critical issue and offer my full support.

H.R. 4419, THE SOCIAL SECURITY PROCEDURAL IMPROVEMENTS ACT OF 1986

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 4419, the Social Security Procedural Improvements Act of 1986, a bill I have had under development for some time.

An important purpose of the bill is to streamline the administration of the disability process in order to prevent a reoccurrence of the chaos which occurred when 28 States and territories failed to follow national continuing disability review policy. This failure reflected court orders in some instances, and willful State rebellion in others. In either event, the result was chaos.

My bill reasserts national control of a national program, to which workers throughout this country contribute in the expectation their taxes will be prudently managed, thus enabling Social Security benefits to help provide a foundation for their future needs.

The bill contains three main provisions which are designed to facilitate improved program management.

First, it permits the Secretary of HHS to federalize State agencies at any time "to assure the effective, equitable and uniform administration of the program." This differs from current law which obligates the Secretary to show that the State agency has substantially failed to make decisions in accord with laws and regulations.

The purpose of this provision is not only to avoid future differences in policy interpretation, but to assure that the Secretary has the authority to federalize the disability determination process whenever federalization would better serve the program.

The States were initially given this responsibility because of their closer links to the medical community—from which reports would be needed—and because of the State link with vocational rehabilitation. Both rationales have been overtaken by program history and are no longer as relevant as the ensuring of effective, equitable, and uniform national administration of the disability program.

Let me assure you that this bill provides for fair and equitable treatment of the State employees who may be federalized. The disability determination process requires their continued expertise, and this bill provides an orderly and fair transition to Federal employment, with protections to ensure pay, leave, and pension equivalent to Federal employees of comparable status. As an aside, let me explain that SSA already absorbs the State agencies costs, including retirement contributions for these employees, so federalizing certain State agencies can be done in a cost-effective manner.

Second, it eliminates the appeals council, and the review performed by it, which is the third and final administrative appeal.

This provision is intended to streamline the entire appeals process, by eliminating a paper review of the decision of the administrative law judge. Under the third provision of my bill, which establishes a Social Security court, I believe applicants will benefit by quicker access to the court.

Lest there be apprehension that current appeals council members and their staff would be summarily cut adrift, I anticipate they would be needed to help operate the new court, or to reinforce the Office of Hearings, which I expect would continue to exercise the Secretary's responsibility for own motion reviews of cases decided by administrative law judges.

I am, however, sympathetic to the criticisms these own motion reviews have received, because in some cases they have delayed payment unreasonably. I believe—again in the interest of national uniformity—that these reviews of ALJ decisions should continue. But, in the interest of mitigating financial hardship, this bill would authorize interim payments 90 days after the Secretary initiates the review. Further, these payments would not be recoverable as overpayments if the final decision of the Secretary is that the claimant is ineligible.

Third, it establishes a Social Security court, and let me acknowledge that this builds on a prior proposal of my colleague, JAKE PICKLE, to create a disability court. The court I envision would be modeled on the Tax Court, and should assure consistent, uniform, and more expert handling of court cases. Most importantly, it should eliminate the muddle caused by conflicting court opinions.

Further, the bill provides that all appeals from this court would be channeled to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, again eliminating the potential for multiple and contradictory court decisions on a variety of highly technical program issues. I think it is important to note that the intent of this provision is not so much to stifle legal interpretation of statutory and regulatory requirements, as to quantify those interpretations, so that the issues and costs can be resolved more speedily by the administration and Congress. And, it is most certainly not an attempt to delay justice; the bill contains an adequate transitional period and mechanism to process pipeline cases.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the preliminary cost-estimates provided by SSA for the short-range administrative costs of the proposals to federalize the State agencies, eliminate the appeals council, and create a Social Security court are less than $5 million for 1986–1990. I am confident that these provisions would not only improve program administration, but in the long run result in program savings.

Unfortunately, the recent chaos in the disability program has been costly—to the beneficiaries and to the trust funds, which must bear not only program costs, but the administrative costs of reviewing, and re-reviewing, cases under different and conflicting guidelines. In this context there is an intangible factor, the impact on employee morale of working under chaotic, constantly changing rules and public criticism. I believe enactment of H.R. 4419 provides assurance that this history will not repeat itself.

I commend this measure to all of my colleagues, and urge those on the Ways and Means Committee to consider H.R. 4419 as expeditiously as possible.

NATIONAL WOMEN'S HEALTH AWARENESS MONTH—JUNE 1986

HON. TIM VALENTINE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, today, Congresswoman MARILYN LLOYD and I are introducing a resolution designating the month of June 1986 as "National Women's Health Awareness Month." The resolution authorizes the President to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States, and Federal, State, and local governments to observe this month with appropriate activities.

Why a resolution on women's health? In recent years, society has changed, and women are assuming new roles and facing new challenges. Women in the United States are involved in a spectrum of activities today that were barely discernible on yesterday's horizon. But with new opportunity has come new demands and dangers and the need for all of us, especially women, to assess the health risks we face.

Our resolution seeks to identify those women's health issues that are most important in our society today. Some of these issues involve diseases that affect women exclusively, such as premenstrual syndrome or cervical cancer. Others involve disorders affecting women at a higher ratio than men, such as diabetes or osteoporosis. We hope to heighten public awareness about these diseases and to promote public education and community outreach programs that will help to conquer them.

To cite just one example of the problem, cancer is the leading cause of death among women aged 35 to 54. Although this is mainly due to breast cancer, which caused an estimated 38,000 deaths in 1985, in many States, lung cancer has surpassed the rate of breast cancer, claiming 38,600 deaths in 1985. Lung cancer is on the increase at an alarming rate.

We have an obligation to address these problems and try to find effective solutions. The maintenance of good health is a societal as well as an individual responsibility and is the combined responsibility of the Federal, State, and local governments; professional and community organizations; and citizens themselves. Above and beyond this, there is much that is as yet unknown and requires continuing research and acquisition of knowledge.

Fundamental to the achievement of improved health for all women is the recognition that their lives have changed dramatically in recent years and that future changes are likely to be even greater. Three of the most important social changes affecting women's health are the increasing number of women living in poverty; the unprecedented entry of women into the labor force, including women with infants and small children; and the continuing increase in the longevity of women. We must begin to take these changes into account if programs and policies are to work.

It is absolutely necessary that the Public Health Service should continue to review and monitor its activities in regard to women's health. Women should also increase their efforts to become aware of environmental and behavioral risk factors, as well as factors that promote health and prevent illness. Further, educational and outreach programs should be initiated and expanded by public and private organizations and the media to stress the importance of a healthful lifestyle.

The resolution calls upon all organizations interested in the health of women to study the legislative, policy, and service issues that affect the health of women. These groups are encouraged to promote public education on health matters as well as public policy changes needed to improve women's health.

Mr. Speaker, joining us in the introduction of the resolution as original cosponsors are Representatives CHAPPIE, FUSTER, MARTINEZ, ROYBAL, ROE, DE LA GARZA, SYNAR, TOWNS, LAGOMARSINO, SCHEUER, HOLT, WORTLEY, DYMALLY, MINETA, LELAND, DWYER, DE LUGO, BEDELL, CROCKETT, FAZIO, BENTLEY, PURSELL, and OWENS. We would greatly appreciate your joining in with us to commemorate the entire month of June 1986 as "National Women's Health Awareness Month."

Below is the text of the resolution:

NATIONAL WOMEN'S HEALTH AWARENESS MONTH

Whereas cancer has been the leading cause of death among women and men in the United States between the ages of 35 and 54, and an estimated 119,000 new cases of breast cancer affecting women were reported during 1985, killing approximately 38,400 women;

Whereas the number of deaths resulting from lung cancer in women was approximately 36,600 in 1986, has risen 600 percent in the last 30 years, and may have replaced breast cancer as the leading cause of death among women in the United States;

Whereas an estimated 52,000 new cases of cervical and endometrial cancers were reported during 1985, killing approximately 9,700 women;

Whereas between 30 percent and 80 percent of all women experience premenstrual symptoms, and such symptoms are frequently adverse;

Whereas approximately five percent of the cyclical, psychological, and physical symptoms of such women may occur with sufficient consistency and severity to warrent classification as premenstrual syndrome (commonly known as PMS);

Whereas such illnesses include multiple sclerosis, systemic lupus erythematosus (a disease of the connective tissue), diabetes, and osteoporosis (a disease causing brittle bones, usually in older women), which are diagnosed in more women than men at ratios of 3 to 2; 10 to 1; 2 to 1; and 2 to 1 respectively;

Whereas depression afflicts as many as 14,000,000 Americans annually, and approximately 25 percent of women will suffer from clinically severe depression, compared to 10 percent of men;

Whereas certain eating disorders, such as anorexia nervosa and bulemia, affect one out of every 200 women and will cause both physical and psychological damage;

Whereas the Public Health Service should continue to review and monitor its activities with respect to the health issues of women, and should encourage the expansion of biomedical and behavioral research on health conditions and disease unique to, or more prevalent in, women of all age groups;

Whereas all Americans, and especially women, should increase their efforts to become more aware of the environmental and behavioral risk factors that affect health, and educational and outreach programs should be initiated or expanded by relevant public and private organizations and the media to communicate the importance of a healthy lifestyle; and

Whereas all organizations particularly interested in the health and well-being of women should continue to make deliberate efforts to be informed with respect to legislative, policy, and service issues that affect the health of women, should promote the exchange of information on health issues, and should become advocates of organizations and public policy changes needed to improve and promote health conditions for women: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That June 1986 is designated as "National Women's Health Awareness Month", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal, state and local government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

HONORING THE NORWIN BASKETBALL CHAMPS

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 22, it will be my pleasure to join the Greater Norwin Jaycees in honoring the Norwin Knights boys basketball team at the "Citizen of the Year Award Banquet."

This team won the WPIAL AAA title. This team won more games than any other in Norwin history. This team finished with a 26 and 1 record. This team went through their regular schedule and the WPIAL's undefeated.

Coach Rich Polczynski and his team can take great pride in their accomplishments. While the numbers represent evidence of their commitment and dedication, Coach Polczynski spelled that out more clearly in observing that "the great thing about this group of kids was they played like the score was 0 to 0 the whole season."

The lessons the members of this team learned during this year will stay with them for their entire lives. They will apply the dedication, commitment, teamwork, sacrifice, and loyalty to their lives as they pursue family, personal, and career goals.

As great as the record of this team represents, even greater is the potential it shows for these young men's future. A college coach was once asked which was his greatest team. He told the interviewer he could not answer that question, because he did not know yet which team would produce the most doctors, the most lawyers, the most educators, the most fathers, the most young men were part of their community's progress. It is that measure against which this team will be eventually measured, and the record of the Norwin Knights this year shows us that this is a team whose excellence has just begun.

LIABILITY RISK RETENTION ACT OF 1986

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing the Liability Risk Retention Act of 1986. This bill provides alternatives to the traditional methods of obtaining insurance. It will provide an avenue of relief to those who cannot afford or obtain insurance because of the liability insurance crisis.

Every day we all read of small businesses, day-care centers, nurse-midwives and many others who cannot afford or obtain insurance through no fault of their own. The Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism, on which I am the ranking minority member, has held a series of hearings to determine the cause of this problem and examine proposed solutions. The causes of the problem are multiple; overly competitive pricing of premiums, joint and several liability, and high damage awards from juries are just a few. A wide range of solutions to address this problem has been presented at the subcommittee hearings.

Some have proposed that the McCarran-Ferguson Act be repealed and that the Federal Government regulate the insurance industry. The witnesses who have testified before our subcommittee, however, have not been able to explain how things would be different today in the liability insurance market if these two changes had been made 10 years ago. Why should Federal regulations be any better than State regulations—especially when one considers the long history of State experience in this area?

Along with Federal regulation, some believe that the Federal Government should get into the insurance business—and that the Federal Government can make money in it. If a private industry, motivated by the ever-present scrutiny of its owners, cannot provide this insurance profitably, how does anyone expect the Federal Government to do it? The Federal Government is already in the insurance business, and business has not been good. The Government's National Flood Insurance Program has been in the black only 2 years out of its 17-year history and Congress had to save the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation from bankruptcy last summer by a special supplemental appropriation. I am not convinced that the Federal Government has the ability to run an insurance business better than private industry.

There are also those who call for tort reform. The testimony before the subcommittee has shown that a serious problem exists with the current system of civil justice. Some changes to tort law should be made. Tort reform, however, will take time. Those who cannot obtain insurance due to the capacity shortage in the liability insurance market need an avenue toward relief today. That is what my bill will provide.

The Liability Risk Retention Act of 1986 will expand the coverage of the Product Liability Retention Act of 1981 to include general liability insurance. The bill, therefore, will allow similarly situated business groups to form their own insurance cooperatives, called risk retention groups, across State lines. The groups will then be able to spread and assume all, or any portion of their general liability risks. The bill will also allow people to purchase commercial liability insurance on a group basis.

By providing these two new avenues to insurance, the bill will assist the victims of the current liability insurance crisis. For example, if a small business cannot afford or obtain insurance through the traditional methods of buying from an insurance company or self-insuring, the bill will provide that business the alternative of forming a risk retention group or a purchasing group to obtain coverage.

Some believe that a broad expansion of the Product Liability Risk Retention Act will lead to abuses of the system. For example, some are concerned that persons with different liability risks, such as nurse-midwives and small businesses, will form a risk retention group, thereby unwittingly assuming differing degrees or types of risks. The bill addresses this potential problem by requiring members of risk retention and purchasing groups to be similarly situated with respect to their liability risks that are the subject of the risk retention coverage.

The bill also expands each State's regulatory authority over risk retention groups by requiring the groups to comply with each State's trade practice laws as well as providing authority to each State insurance commissioner to conduct a financial examination of the group if the insurance commissioner where the group is chartered is not conducting such an examination or refuses to do so.

This bill will not solve all the problems presently facing the liability insurance market. But it will provide a desperately needed alternative to the traditional methods of spreading risk. I believe that this bill is a step forward in solving a difficult problem. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.

THE NEED TO INCREASE STUDENT LOANS

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, certainly among the most devastating segments of the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget requests are the major programmatic changes and funding cutbacks in Federal student financial assistance. Once again the President is seeking to drastically reduce this aid that is so vital to thousands of low- and middle-income Americans who rely heavily on Federal help in meeting the growing costs of a higher education.

I would like to share with my colleagues, the following survey that was done by a group of concerned students from Needham High School in Needham, MA., in the Ninth Congressional District. I am very proud of the efforts of these students who have put much time and work into this research.

The survey follows:

THE NEED TO INCREASE STUDENT LOANS

The government must enhance the dignity of the citizen, promote the maximum development of his capabilities, and widen the range of his opportunities. Education is the means to these ends. The cost of education is a restricting force when considering a wide range of opportunity for young people. It is vital that adequate financial aid for education be available for the students.

Adequte financial aid is not available. The current loan limits should be increased. Students have conducted several surveys. A survey of Needham High School seniors indicates that 100% of the students asked feel that the financial aid program should be extended to allow higher loan limits. Ninety percent of the surveyed seniors point out that the financial aid package will have a definite bearing on what college or university they choose to attend. Local college and university students were surveyed to examine the impact of federal aid on their higher education. The percentage of students from the following schools would benefit from our proposed increase: Boston College, MA, 95%; Wellesley College, MA, 70%; General Connecticut State University, 100%; Brandeis University, MA. 80%, Clark University, MA, 50%; Colby College, ME, 100%; Plymouth State College, NH, 50%.

According to U.S. News and World Report, the cost of one year's tuition for colleges has risen by 8% in the last two years. The average costs of one year's tuition at a public college is $4,900. At private institutions, expenses run anywhere from $9,000 to $16,000. For example, Bates College in Maine has increased its tuition by 11% to $14,600 per year. U.S. News and World Report indicates further that 93 out of 100 student loans are being paid back on time, and that the net rate on defaults has declined. The surveys indicate that the high cost of college disallows the promotion of higher learning and is discriminatory. Unless loan limits are increased, many students will not be able to attend the higher learning institution of their choice.

The administration believes that the existing program should be simplified, but this need not mean cut loans. Much of the administration's proposal speaks to poor management, not the need for loans. Therefore, the focus of the problem should be proper administration and management, not reducing the loan limits. The answer is to increase the federal funding and increase the quality of management. Needy students must not become victims of governmental mismanagement.

Our most precious resource is the American child. The dividends which come with the investment in the young people have no equal. The investment in youth will bear everlasting fruit.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE DOMINICK "DICK" PLESCIA OF NEW JERSEY, OUTSTANDING CITIZEN, ESTEEMED UNION REPRESENTATIVE, AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 21, residents of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join with members of the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union AFL-CIO, CLC in testimony to an esteemed union representative, outstanding citizen and good friend—the Honorable Dominick "Dick" Plescia of New Jersey—whose personal commitment and sincerity of purpose in seeking the highest standards of excellence in his quest for economic and social justice for our textile workers especially in their retirement years is applauded by all of us. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our deepest appreciation to Dominick Plescia and share the pride of his wife Helen, daughters Frances and Edith, and son Dick on this milestone of achievement in their family endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, we are all familiar with the goals and objectives of the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, CLC in their constant vigil to enhance conditions in the working place and protect our working people and their hopes for better tomorrows. Dick, a nickname Dominick Plescia acquired in early childhood, by his representation and lifetime of dedication to these same true American ideals of everthing we hold dear—the laborers in the vineyard of our industrial complex, their families, homes, jobs, pensions, security, and opportunities to advance—has truly enriched our community, State, and Nation.

Dick Plescia was born in Lodi, NJ, home of the former United Piece Dye Works, one of the world's largest dyeing and printing companies. Dick remembers the strike at United in 1933 when tear gas, thrown by police at strikers, wafted up Liberty Street to the Wilson School where students were forced to evacuate. Dick was in the seventh grade class at Wilson School at that time.

It was a little more than 5 years later in 1938, after he graduated from Lodi High School, that Dick entered the gates at this same United Piece Dye Works, local 1983, and began his career in the textile dyeing and printing industry. His job as a tuber was short lived, however, so he bounced between United and Weiss and Wilhelm in Passaic for most of that year. In December of 1938, he joined the employment rolls of Martex Print Works, where he remained for the next 14 years. During this period, beginning at the age of 19, he was elected to be the steward of his department, and at age 21 to the executive board of local 1932.

After a number of deferments, due to his job as a color mixer on camouflage parachute cloth, Dick entered the Armed Forces and fought in the front lines of Europe with the 102d Infantry Division (Ozarks). He was captured by the German Army along with the remnants of this company on April 29, 1945, just 9 days before Victory in Europe [VE] Day. His company was only 35 miles from Berlin at the time. Dick's company was liberated by the 82d Airborne Division on May 5, 1945, 20 miles from the Danish border.

After returning home from the war in Europe, Dick returned to his job at Martex Print Works, which had changed its name to Texstyle Corp. He resumed his active participation in local union affairs. In 1945, he was elected as vice president of the 3,500-member local 1932. In February 1952, Dick was elected president and manager and served nine consecutive 2-year terms.

In June 1969, Dick was appointed to the position of assistant director for the Quin State Region and 6 months later was appointed manager of the 5,000-member Chicago Joint Board which served its membership over a vast region including Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

In 1972 Dick suffered a heart attack. Although he fully recovered, he felt he had to get away from the harsh winters of the Midwest and moved to the Los Angeles area in August 1972. He was appointed organizer-business agent of the Los Angeles Joint Board where he served for almost 5 years. He assisted in the formation of the Southern California-Textile Industry Health and Welfare Fund and was its chairman for several years.

In 1977 he was appointed to the position of director of the carpet, cordage and knitting industries of the textile division of ACTWU. Within a period of 2 years he was appointed to assistant administrator of the Textile Workers Pension Fund and 2 years later succeeded to his current high office of public trust as the fund manager of the Textile Workers Pension Fund.

Under Dick's leadership the fund increased from $49 million in assets at the close of fiscal year 1980 to $86 million at the close of fiscal year 1985. He also helped to streamline and computerize the fund's operations attaining a new sense of security and numerous additional benefits, both operational and design in nature, for continued security and growth. During the tenure of Dick Plescia as fund manager, a number of dramatic changes have occurred to protect and enhance the security of the fund for its beneficiaries. Dick should indeed be highly content in the knowledge that his goals and objectives to administer the Textile Workers Pension Fund so that "in the twilight of their years, the senior textile workers may enjoy retirement to a fuller degree" have truly contributed to the quality of life and way of life for those retirees.

Mr. Speaker, there is much that can be said of Dick Plescia and his lifetime of achievements in service to people. He has extended the richness of his wisdom and expertise—always giving willingly and unselfishly of his time—in helping others. We are especially proud of his compassion, dedication, and untiring efforts on behalf of his fellow workers.

Dick's professional expertise in the American labor movement has enabled him to achieve State and national acclaim for his union representation of the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of life and way of life here in America. He has served our people and our country with honor and distinction.

As we gather together on Friday, March 21 in tribute to his leadership endeavors and sincerity of purpose dedicated to service to people, we do indeed salute a great American—the Honorable Dominick "Dick" Plescia.

NATIONAL PARKS OVERFLIGHT LEGISLATION

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be introducing today legislation to study the problem of overflights of our national parks. Thousands of people each year visit our national parks to enjoy their beauty and the serenity of the surroundings. The parks offer an opportunity for many to leave the hurried existence of city life for a few hours and have some time in a peaceful environment.

Unfortunately, for many tourists, campers, and hikers, their visits are interrupted by low-flying planes and helicopters. Many come to our national parks to experience some quiet and enjoyment. But this is not possible if you have planes and helicopters flying unreasonably low over the campgrounds, hiking trails, and other points of interest in our Nation's parks.

While officials of the Department of the Interior and the Federal Aviation Administration have worked together on this matter for a number of years, there is still some dispute over what the appropriate altitude is for aircraft flying over our national parks. Today I am introducing a bill to require the Secretary of the Interior to conduct a study to determine the appropriate minimum altitude for aircraft flying over national parks. This bill would require the Secretary of Transportation, acting through the Federal Aviation Administration, to provide technical assistance in carrying out this study.

The study would identify the problems that are created when aircraft fly over our national parks, and show where the most serious adverse impacts exist. Not less than 10 units of the National Park System shall be studied, including Grand Canyon National Park, Yosemite National Park, Hawaii Volcanoes National Park, Glacier National Park, and Mount Rushmore National Memorial.

In evaluating the impacts on the specific parks noted above, information shall be required on how aircraft noise affects the safety of the park system users, including hikers, rock climbers, and boaters. Additionally, the study shall look at the impacts of these flights on the natural, historical, and cultural resources of each park. The Secretary of the Interior will be required to report to the Congress on his findings within 2 years after enactment of the bill.

I believe this legislation will help to resolve some of the controversy surrounding overflights of our national parks. I look forward to its early enactment and to the results of this study.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that a recent article from the March/April edition of the National Parks magazine about this problem be reprinted at this point:

AIRBORNE VIEWS—THE PURE SILENCE OF GRAND CANYON IS SHATTERED BY CONSTANT OVERFLIGHTS

(By Kathryn Kahler)

On the footpath of Bright Angel Trail or along the banks of the Colorado River as it cuts through the inner gorge of the Grand Canyon, the tranquility of hikers is pierced by the almost constant roar of aircraft taking sightseers on expensive tours. The aircraft sound like angry mosquitoes as they enter the vast chasm, chiseled by nature about 25 million years ago during the Paleozoic Era.

Below, an eerie quiet envelopes the remote backcountry trails, a quiet few people ever experience and one of the canyon's most remarkable features. Not even the rustle of leaves or the swoosh of the mighty Colorado River disturbs the serenity of the canyon—until the aircraft fly over again.

Backpackers, with their canteens of water, hike down the Bright Angel or Kaibab trails into 100-degree heat, anticipating the hard, several-thousand-foot hike out of the canyon. They have come in search of a peacefulness that visitors say is unsurpassed anywhere on earth.

"Generations of people have come to the canyon to experience the incredible silence of the place," says Dennis Brownridge, a Tucson geography teacher who has hiked much of the canyon. "The quiet is more impressive than the colors of the sunsets. Most people have never experienced anything like it."

With their rotors beating like machine guns, the helicopters swoop off the Abyss on the west rim of the majestic canyon where it drops 3,500 feet to the Tonto Plateau. The air ships disappear from sight then reappear again as they zip from one butte to another—through Confucius Gap and around the ancient ruins of the Anasazi Indians.

The noise of their engines reverberates continuously throughout the canyon. Even commercial jets at altitudes of 30,000 feet and military jets flying low to sightsee disturb the tranquility of the backcountry.

"The noise is like Chinese water torture," Brownridge says, "Just as you settle back to relax, another plane comes over and tenses your muscles. It makes you angry."

It is ironic that the park known for its cathedral quiet now has the most disturbing noise. Although Grand Canyon has the worst overflight problem, it is by no means the only national park under seige by loud military aircraft and profitable sightseeing companies eager to take tourists on quick trips through America's crown jewels.

At Fort Jefferson National Monument off the Everglades in the Gulf of Mexico, century-old-bricks are dropping into the moat of this pre-Civil War structure as military jets make high-speed turnarounds.

Fighter pilots from air bases near Sequoia-Kings Canyon national parks in California streak through the parks' narrow canyons, practicing for combat missions. The sound is deafening, and some hikers have been forced to the ground by the low-flying aircraft.

At Cumberland Island National Seashore in Georgia, light airplanes buzz the waterfront and even land on the beach, endangering sunbathers and fishermen. The landings are illegal, but the state of Georgia has never given the National Park Service (NPS) law-enforcement authority on the beach. So the practice continues, even though part of the island is designated wilderness.

Hikers in the backcountry at Yosemite National Park in California say commercial aircraft flying on the transcontinental route from San Fransciso are ruining the quiet they seek among the park's famed ganite mountains.

Only recently has the NPS begun to address the problem of noisy and potentially dangerous air flights over America's national parks. The controversy has pitted environmentalists against air-tour operators.

The NPS seems caught in the middle. It must balance a dual mandate: to protect and preserve the natural beauty of the parks while making them available for visitors.

At Grand Canyon, some environmentalists have called for a complete ban on all scenic flights over the park. National Parks and Conservation Association, however, has promoted a more balanced approach in which flights would be restricted in some areas and perhaps banned during some months of the year.

Air-tour operators, on the other hand, argue that their services make the canyon experience available to tourists on short visits to the park as well as handicapped and elderly. They contend that, unlike campers, they leave no refuse.

Ronald Warren, general manager of Grand Canyon Airlines, calls the air tours "the cleanest method of seeing the canyon." Environmentalists point out that the tour companies do pollute—both the quiet and the clear skies.

"The last thing we're trying to do is annoy someone," says Joel Rash, director of operations for Grand Canyon Helicopters.

That is also the aim of park officials at the Grand Canyon who are engaged in the lengthy and cumbersome process of trying to balance the desires of environmentalists and air operators. Russ Butcher, NPCA's Southwest/California regional representative, says the NPS "is bending over backwards" to hear all sides and come to a reasonable solution.

"It's a definite conflict," Butcher says. "People who take river trips will get off their boats, walk up to a waterfall in the lower part of the canyon, and a helicopter will be hovering overhead. The roar of the helicopter is magnified inside the canyon and the vibrations one feels are intense.

"This is a problem and the Park Service is addressing it, trying to resolve it through direct dialogue," he added.

The Grand Canyon air traffic problem is at a crucial point, and NPS efforts to resolve the problem have gained national attention. Park managers across the country are watching and waiting for the Grand Canyon solution, which likely will be used as a model for similar aircraft problems at parks across the country.

This situation is further complicated by the fact that the NPS does not have jurisdiction over its own air space, but can only complain to the Federal Aviation Administration. (The question of jurisdiction is now being studied by the Solicitor's Office of the Interior Department.) Recently, the NPS and the Federal Aviation Administration issued an advisory requesting that aircraft fly at least 2,000 feet above the national park. But that advisory is ignored every day.

John Guthrie, deputy superintendent at Grand Canyon, says, "We're trying to talk it over, but if it gets to the point where we're playing hardball, our position has to be to protect the resource . . . and that means we'd have to advocate restricted flights."

Last year, Yosemite was confronted with a similar controversey when a Fresno, California, outift proposed scenic flights over the park that Ansel Adams chronicled with his awe-inspiring photographs. So far, park officials say the scenic flights have been quite limited and have not posed a problem, particularly over the heavily traveled Yosemite Valley.

Although the number of Yosemite flyovers may increase, no national park suffers the air assault that Grand Canyon does. Sharon Johnson, a Yosemite employee who hiked the Grank Canyon last spring, says:

"At times you could count four planes at one time, ten in a couple of minutes. It's like a beating hammer. I'm an avid user of the backcountry, and I find the constant drone disturbing."

Scenic air flights began at the Grand Canyon in 1926, but in the last ten years the number of air operators has more than tripled. Forty-nine companies offer scenic tours out to Tusayan, a town that lies next to the park's south rim. And flights originate in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, and Phoenix as well.

Last year, approximately 400,000 tourists paid from $50 to $200 for scenic tours of the canyon. Most of these tours took less than an hour.

Flight operators estimate the tour business at Grand Canyon alone is a $50-million-per-year industry. They say they provide a needed service for many of the canyon's 2.5 million annual visitors.

Air tours allow the handicapped to view the park. And flight operators say that older visitors are more likely to view Grand Canyon from the air. As America's population ages, their services will be more in demand, air operators argue. They also point out that they help the NPS by reporting park emergencies and assisting in search-and-rescue missions deep in the inner gorge of the canyon.

Robert J. Donaldson, chief pilot for Grand Canyon Airlines and president of Grand Canyon Flight Operators Association, which represents 22 flight companies, says, "We don't want to turn this into a Coney Island . . . the star of our show is the Grand Canyon."

Viewing the canyon by air—particularly by helicopter—is an unforgettable experience. One swoops within a hundred yards of Cheops Pyramid or the Osiris Temple; and the patina of reds that covers many of the buttes glows like desert varnish.

Some air passengers are overcome with emotion at the visual splendor. Others equate the canyon flight with a religious experience.

Hikers find their experiences with Grand Canyon aircraft unforgettable in quite another way. At any one time, a dozen aircraft may be buzzing through the canyon.

In fact, the 1977 NPS Towler Study of backcountry hikers found that they were distracted by aircraft up to 71 percent of the time. A 1978-1980 study concluded that aircraft noise was evident in some areas of the canyon up to 95 percent of the time, or an average of 47 percent of the time. In a 1983 NPCA study, resource managers at more than 50 national park areas throughout the country said they had significant overflight problems.

Currently, several studies are underway to examine the effects of aircraft noise on a variety of wildlife and on cultural treasures. In the meantime, park officials, environmentalists, and air-tour operators are trying to hammer out a solution.

The NPS recently completed a series of public meetings on the issue, and has developed several strategies. Steve Hodapp, chief of resources management at Grand Canyon, says they are now refining these strategies and working toward a draft management plan. The National Park Service plan is expected out in late spring.

But some environmentalists insist on a total ban. They say that the NPS is violating the law by allowing aircraft to use the park without imposing any regulations on overflights.

NPCA believes that a ban is not a realistic solution. It favors a combination of several management options, including:

Minimum altitude restrictions;

Flight patterns that avoid areas popular with backcountry hikers;

A ban on canyon flights during certain times of the day, particularly the early morning and late afternoon. People on the ground cherish these times because of the awesome quiet;

A ban on aircraft at certain times of the year, perhaps in January, February, or March. Many hikers visit the canyon during these months, but the demand for air tours is low.

"If we end up with these kinds of meaningful changes, I think that people who visit the canyon by helicopter or by fixed-wing plane could continue to do so without any appreciable problem for ground users," says Butcher.

"These seem to hold out the most hope," he added. "The air operators don't want a black eye. They want to be accepted and to get along with the Park Service."

As for military flights, the NPS seems almost helpless. Two years ago, a Sequoia National Park helicopter was involved in a near mid-air collision with a low-flying military jet. At Death Valley and other national park areas close to military installations, sonic booms cause headaches.

Because the Department of Defense has no real policy directing its aircraft to avoid national parks, the NPS can only deal with military overflight problems incident by incident. In such cases, an accurate description of the plane must be recorded. But backcountry hikers say the phantom jets fly too fast to get the necessary information.

Meanwhile, military jets continue to "hotdog" through park canyons, often blasting the sound barrier. Scenic tour companies send their ranks of helicopters and airplanes across the skies of America's crown jewels, disturbing the pristine environment President Woodrow Wilson intended to preserve when he signed the National Park Service Organic Act in 1916.

Says one hiker: "You grit your teeth, you clench your hands. It gets to your soul. Something has to be done."

THE CONRAIL PUBLIC SALE ACT OF 1986

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation enabling the Department of Transportation to sell the Government's interest in Conrail to Conrail Acquisition Corp. A company advised and assisted by the investment firms of Allen & Co. and First Boston Corp. Funds to purchase Conrail would be raised in a single transaction through a public offering of shares of Conrail Acquisition Corp. This bill brings to the Government a price superior to any offer received to date and it does so without the substantial loss of tax revenue which would result from a sale, as proposed by the Department of Transportation, to Norfolk Southern. This bill keeps Conrail's management team in place, and preserves Conrail as an independent entity able to provide vigorous competition in rail freight service in the Northeast, Midwest, and connecting routes through the South and West without threat of antitrust violation. Rather than being owned by another large railroad, as under the Norfolk Southern proposal, or by a small group of large private investors, as under the Morgan Stanley offer, Conrail Acquisition Corp. will be a publicly held corporation with no dominant ownership interest. Moreover, the bill's benefits for labor are more attractive than either of the other offers. I look forward to early hearings on this legislation so that its benefits can be fully explored.

The proceeds to the Government from the sale of Conrail to Conrail Acquisition Corp. would be $1.8 billion. This is approximately $600 million more than is being offered by Norfolk Southern and approximately $400 million more than is being offered by the Morgan Stanley sponsored group. Conrail Acquisition Corp. will surrender all unused net operating loss and investment tax credit carryforwards, and deficits, in Conrail's earnings and profit account. An independent Conrail will not cost the Government what Treasury estimates to be $174 million in lost tax revenue should the sale to Norfolk Southern take place. The Congressional Budget Office estimates this lost tax revenue at $400 million. Conrail Acquisition Corp. also will be agreeing to all of the public service covenants contained in the memorandum of intent between the Department of Transportation and Norfolk Southern.

By keeping Conrail independent, rail freight competition in Conrail's service area will be preserved. A sale to Norfolk Southern, on the other hand, is thought to be anticompetitive by most antitrust experts. The Department of Justice has not yet completed its review. But, in an attempt to mitigate certain of the anticompetitive consequences of a sale to Norfolk Southern, Justice has recommended the divestiture of Guilford Transportation, and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad. Most critics are still not satisfied. The U.S. Railway Association [USRA], the staff of the ICC, 25 State attorneys general, various State departments of transportation, cities and local governments, and hundreds of shippers remain concerned that a sale to Norfolk Southern is anticompetitive. An ICC report, however, reached different conclusions about the divestiture stating that even with these additional lines the future viability of these two carriers is in jeopardy.

Why eliminate the only large successful railroad in the Northeast? Why jeopardize thousands of jobs as well as important shipping traffic? Why limit severely the competitive advantage offered to shippers by the Ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore? An independent Conrail will help save jobs as well as competition. The USRA now concludes, and I concur, that Conrail can survive on its own. Conrail management has performed brilliantly. The Staggers Act of 1980 and the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 totally changed Conrail's operating environment by allowing the railroad to manage according to the changing needs of the marketplace. With these statutory changes, its able management, and, just as importantly, a cooperative labor agreement, Conrail has experienced an unparalleled financial turnabout. Profits last year were $440 million, while at the same time Conrail was investing hundreds of millions of dollars in improved track and equipment. It has done this with only modest rate increases, and has now returned its employees to industry-level wages. As for the future, Conrail projections support the case that Conrail will be viable as a publicly held company.

As for labor, the terms of the sale under my bill are also superior. It has a potential value of $504 million as compared to the $375 million in Norfolk Southern's offer and the $475 million in the Morgan Stanley proposal. In Conrail Acquisition Corp's proposal, shares in the ESOP would be purchased at the same price offered the Government, or $274 million; Conrail employees would become entitled to receive Conrail benefits, including cash payments aggregating approximately $200 million for union employees and $30 million for nonunion employees in settlement of claims arising from past wage concessions and any rights or options under existing statutes to acquire Conrail stock.

In summary, my bill would keep Conrail independent and does so at a price fair to the Government. Furthermore, it would help preserve competition in freight rail service and jobs in this vital industry.

Following is the section-by-section analysis of the "Conrail Public Sale Act of 1986."

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF CONRAIL PUBLIC SALE ACT OF 1986

Section 1.—Short title

This section states that the legislation may be cited as the "Conrail Public Sale Act of 1986" (the "Act").

Section 2.—Findings

This section sets forth eight findings which are that:

(1) The Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 ("NERSA") provided for an orderly return of Consolidated Rail Corporation ("Conrail") to the private sector;

(2) NERSA successfully provided for the transfer of Conrail's commuter service responsibilities to other entities and in preparing Conrail for return to the private sector;

(3) The United States Railway Association ("USRA") found Conrail met the standards of profitability necessary for it to be returned to the private sector;

(4) Conrail Acquisition Corporation, Inc. (the "Purchaser") developed a proposal to purchase the interest of the Federal Government in the common stock of Conrail and to return Conrail to broad private ownership by financing such purchase through a public stock offering;

(5) The sale of Conrail to the Purchaser best meets the objectives of leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves by continuing Conrail as an independent railroad and maximizing the return to the Federal Government;

(6) The purchaser's proposal to acquire the Federal Government's interest in Conrail satisfies the requirements of NERSA and section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (the "3-R Act");

(7) Amendments to existing laws are needed to permit the sale of Conrail to the Purchaser and to permit the cancellation of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail's debt and preferred stock; and

(8) It is not necessary to immunize the sale of Conrail to the Purchaser from any antitrust law of the United States.

Section 3.—Purpose

This section states that it is the purpose of the Act to return Conrail to the private sector by directing and facilitating the sale of Conrail to the Purchaser.

Section 4.—Definitions

This section defines key terms used in the Act, including the "Purchase Agreement".

The "Purchase Agreement" is defined to mean the agreement between the Purchaser and the Secretary of Transportation (i) with respect to the period before the execution and delivery thereof, in the form filed with the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives; and (ii) with respect to the period after such execution and delivery, as so executed and delivered.

Other terms defined by this section of the Act are the "closing date," "Conrail," the "ESOP," the "Purchaser" and the "Secretary."

TITLE 1—AMENDMENTS TO THE 3-R ACT AND NERSA

Section 101.—Limit on authority to purchase stock

This section amends Section 216(b) of the 3-R Act to provide that the authority of USRA to purchase debentures or preferred stock of Conrail will terminate upon the consummation of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail pursuant to the Purchase Agreement.

Section 102.—State and local taxation

This section amends Section 217(c) of the 3-R Act to clarify that Conrail will remain exempt from all state taxes, except for taxes imposed by any political subdivision of a state, imposed with respect to any period ending on or before the closing date of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser pursuant to the Purchase Agreement.

Section 103.—Responsibility of Conrail directors

This section amends Section 301(i) of the 3-R Act to provide that the members of Conrail's Board of Directors shall be immune against civil liability for actions taken to implement the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser.

Section 104.—Applicability of the 3-R Act to Conrail after sale

This section amends Section 301 of the 3-R Act by adding a new sub-section "(k)" which states that, with certain exceptions, the provisions of the 3-R Act shall not apply to Conrail or to its Board of Directors after the closing date. The provision of the 3-R Act that would continue to apply are enumerated in the new sub-section. Under these provisions:

(1) The definitions set forth in the Section 102 of the 3-R Act, as amended by the Act, are retained.

(2) The Conrail seat on the USRA Board of Directors provided by Section 201(d) of the 3-R Act is continued in order to facilitate cooperation between the USRA and Conrail regarding information needed to resolve, after the consummation of the sale, matters which arise before the sale. In addition, it is clarified that the Conrail member of the USRA Board may send a representative to USRA Board meetings who may exercise the full powers of such member thereat.

(3) The requirement of Section 203 of the 3-R Act that Conrail make information available to the USRA is retained, but only with respect to the information related to procedings pending before the special court established under Section 209(b) of the 3-R Act (the "Special Court").

(4) The immunity against civil liability for trustees and other persons with responsibility for the Conrail ESOP provided by Section 216(f)(8) is continued, but only with respect to activities that take place prior to, or are connected with, the sale; and the obligation of the United States under section 216(f)(9) to indemnify such persons from liabilities, costs and expenses incurred in connection with any such activities is retained.

(5) The qualification of the Conrail ESOP for tax purposes in connection with contributions, allocations and withdrawals made in connection with the implementation of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail, as provided by Section 216(f)(11) of the 3-R Act, as added by this Act, and the exemption of certain related transactions regarding the Conrail ESOP from the Federal securities laws, as provided by Section 216(f)(12) of the 3-R Act, as added by this Act, would continue to be applicable after the closing date in accordance with the terms of such sections.

(6) The exemption of Conrail from state and local taxes imposed with respect to periods ending on or before the closing date, as provided by Section 217(c) of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, and the right to collect upon the debts accumulated by commuter authorities for Conrail's operation of commuter service prior to January 1, 1983, as provided by Section 217(e) of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, are retained.

(7) The immunity against civil liability for members of Conrail's Board of Directors for actions taken prior to or in connection with the implementation of the sale, pursuant to Section 301(i) of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, is retained.

(8) Rights and obligations already adjudicated and specified in the order of the Special Court in connection with the expedited supplemental transactions in New England as a result of NERSA amendments to Section 305 of the 3-R Act are preserved and the continuing administration thereof is retained within the jurisdiction of the Special Court.

(9) Conrail's right to abandon lines on an expedited basis pursuant to Section 308 of the 3-R Act is continued, but only in those cases where Conrail filed for such abandonment prior to consummation of the sale; after the sale, Conrail will be bound by regular ICC abandonment procedures.

(10) Sections 401, 402, 404 and 408 of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, which relate to the sale process and contain the continuing public interest covenants which will be applicable to Conrail and the Purchaser after the closing date, are continued.

(11) Section 701 of the 3-R Act is retained, but only as may be necessary to identify employees eligible for benefits prescribed under that section and only as affected by Section 109 of this Act, which provides that (a) the benefits schedule prescribed under said Section 701 by the Secretary of Labor will continue in effect until superseded by an agreement between Conrail and its labor representatives, and (b) after consummation of the sale, Conrail shall be responsible for funding such labor benefits under Section 701.

(12) The employee positions "blanked" or abolished by Conrail under Section 702(e) of the 3-R Act will continue to be blanked.

(13) Federal Employers Liability Act claims arising from injuries incurred by employees of predecessor railroads prior to the beginning of Conrail operations on April 1, 1976 will continue to be Conrail's responsibility through the continued applicability of Section 709 of the 3-R Act.

(14) Labor protection provided to Conrail employees terminated prior to consummation of the sale will continue to be the responsibility of the Federal Government under Section 710(b)(1) of the 3-R Act.

(15) The exemption from state full crew laws provided by Section 711 of the 3-R Act is continued after consummation of the sale for Conrail as well as for other railroads in the Conrail region.

(16) The authority to submit certain disputes and controversies to final and binding arbitration under Section 714 of the 3-R Act is continued, but only with regard to disputes and controversies arising prior to consummation of the sale.

Section 1136 of NERSA, which relieved Conrail of any obligation under law to operate commuter service on January 1, 1983, is not specifically enumerated because such section is not part of the 3-R Act and therefore remains in effect even though not among the above enumerated provisions.

Section 105.—Implementation of sale

This section amends Section 401 of the 3-R Act which is the section added by NERSA that authorize the Secretary to arrange for the sale of Conrail as an entity. Specifically, it amends such section by inserting in substitution for the existing text new language providing that no later than 10 days following enactment of this Act the Secretary of Transportation shall enter into the Purchase Agreement with the Purchaser and transfer the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser in accordance therewith. The existing language of Section 401 contains complex provisions regarding the procedures for consummation of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail (including the legislative veto provided by Subsection (a) and the subsection (e) requirement that the Secretary of Transportation first offer the stock to be sold to Conrail employees who had experienced prior wage reductions) which are no longer necessary or appropriate in the context of the sale proposal delivered by the Purchaser.

The Certificate of Incorporation of the Purchaser provides that until the third anniversary of the Purchaser's acquisition of Conrail, the number of shares of common stock of the Purchaser owned or held by any person or any syndicate or affiliated group of persons will not be permitted at any time to exceed 5 percent of the total number of shares of such class of stock at the time outstanding or such lesser percentage as the Purchaser's Board of Directors may from time to time establish. Underwriting syndicates and commercial banks, trusts broker/dealers, clearing corporations or nominees are not subject to this limitation. The Certificate of Incorporation of the Purchaser further provides that this restriction may only be amended by the vote of at least 90% of the outstanding shares of stock of the Purchaser entitled to vote with respect thereto. The Purchaser has indicated that equivalent provisions will be inserted in the Articles of Incorporation of Conrail upon the effectiveness of the anticipated merger of the Purchaser into Conrail following the sale. Accordingly, it is not necessary to include in the Act a statutory provision for the purpose of ensuring widespread public ownership of Conrail and the Purchaser.

Section 106.—Cancellation of debt and preferred stock

This section amends Section 402 of the 3-R Act to provide for the recapitalization of Conrail so that the debt and preferred stock held by the Federal Government are cancelled and the outstanding shares of Conrail common stock are split so that there will be 100 million such shares outstanding.

The Federal Government, through USRA, presently holds approximately $851 million principal amount of Conrail debentures, $2.3 billion of Conrail Series A preferred stock and $32 million of Conrail Series B preferred stock. Section 402 currently provides for the recapitalization and cancellation of such debt and preferred stock; however, the Federal Government would maintain a contingent interest which would attach to the debt or preferred stock in the event of a future bankruptcy, substantial sale or liquidation of Conrail's assets. This provision was added by NERSA because Congress determined that no prospective purchaser of Conrail's common stock would buy such stock subject to the debt and preferred stock. At the same time, Congress wanted to discourage any purchaser from buying Conrail with the idea of extracting its cash and other assets, selling it or liquidating it. Accordingly, Congress provided for the contingent liability. However, it has now proven impracticable to sell Conrail with such contingent liability. Further, the Purchaser has indicated that it intends for Conrail to operate as an independent, publicly-held entity over the long haul, and on the basis of various financial studies and analyses of Conrail it appears that Conrail will be viable as an independent entity for the foreseeable future.

The recapitalization of the common stock of Conrail is authorized so that on the closing date Conrail's outstanding shares of common stock will be equal in number to the outstanding shares of common stock of the Purchaser, facilitating the receipt by the shareholders of the Purchaser in the anticipated subsequent merger of the Purchaser into Conrail of one share of Conrail common stock for each share of common stock of the Purchaser held by them prior to such merger.

This section also adds a new subsection (b) to Section 402 of the 3-R Act providing that for purposes of regulation by the ICC and state public utility regulators, the recapitalization authorized by this section, the sale of Federal Government's interest in Conrail and the value of the consideration received by the Federal Government for such interest will not reduce Conrail's investment, net of depreciation, in any of its assets nor affect the calculation of Conrail's stock or asset values, expenses, costs, returns, profits or revenues or otherwise be the basis for any change in the regulation of Conrail by such bodies.

Section 107.—Public interest obligations

This section establishes numerous public interest obligations to which Conrail will be subject following the sale of the Federal Government's interest to the Purchaser. In addition, the section establishes that the Purchaser will, prior to the anticipated merger of the Purchaser into Conrail, be subject to most of the same public interest obligations. The public interest obligations set forth in section are equivalent to those contained in the Memorandum of Intent, dated February 8, 1985, entered into by the Secretary of Transportation with Norfolk Southern Corporation. These obligations are designed to preserve the financial viability of Conrail and to ensure the continuing ability of Congress and the Secretary of Transportation to review the financial condition of Conrail on an ongoing basis.

Subsection (a) sets forth various definitions used in the section, including definitions of "affiliate", "capital expenditures", "cumulative net income", "debt", "person", "prefered stock" and "subsidiary".

Subsection (b) sets forth several affirmative obligations which will be applicable to Conrail for a period of five years beginning on the closing date. These obligations are as follows:

(1) Conrail is required to furnish to the Secretary of Transportation audited annual financial statements and unaudited quarterly financial statements.

(2) Conrail and its railroad subsidiaries are required to continue in the railroad business substantially as such business was being conducted as of December 31, 1985 and, subject to permitted abandonments and service alterations in accordance with applicable law and normal procedures and regulations of the ICC, to maintain rail freight services throughout its system.

(3) Conrail is required to continue its practice of offering any line for which an abandonment certificate is issued by the ICC to a purchaser who agrees to provide interconnecting rail service at a price equal to 75% of the net liquidation value of such line as determined by the ICC.

(4) Conrail and its subsidiaries are required to maintain their properties in good working condition and not to permit deferred maintenance in order to provide and maintain rail service as required by the section.

(5) Conrail and its subsidiaries are required to maintain insurance against loss or damage of the kinds customarily insured against by similarly situated corporations.

(6) Conrail is required to make capital expenditures in each fiscal year in an amount equal to the greater of Conrail's depreciation for financial reporting purposes for such year or $500,000,000. Conrail's Board of Directors is authorized to reduce such amount in a given year if the Board determines that a lesser amount is justified by prudent business and engineering practices. Certain specified minimum capital expenditure benchmark levels must, however, be met on each of the first five anniversaries of the sale date.

(7) Conrail is required to maintain on a consolidated basis cash and cash equivalents on hand of not less than $500,000,000.

(8) Conrail and its subsidiaries are required to pay all debt promptly when due and payable.

(9) Conrail and its subsidiaries are required to keep books and records in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles as applicable to reporting companies under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

(10) Conrail is required to continue to operate from its headquarters in Philadelphia and to maintain its locomotive shop and car repair shop in Altoona, Pennsylvania.

(11) Conrail is required to maintain or reestablish with small eastern rail carriers which had less than $300,000,000 annual operating revenues in their most recent fiscal year reasonably efficient routes of major importance at the request of any such rail carrier.

(12) Conrail is required to continue its affirmative action program substantially as conducted as of December 31, 1985.

(13) Conrail is required to deliver certificates to the Secretary of Transportation on a quarterly basis and in connection with the declaration of any common or preferred stock "payment" (as defined in paragraphs (5) and (6) of subsection (c) of this section) certifying that it is in compliance with all of the obligations set forth in Section 404 of the 3-R Act as amended by this Act. The Secretary is required to submit annual reports to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation listing all certificates filed by Conrail during the preceding year under this statutory provision.

(14) Conrail is required to give prompt notice to the Secretary of Transportation of any defaults under any of its obligations in subsection (b) or (c) of Section 404.

Additional public interest obligations, also applicable for a five year period commencing on the closing date, are set forth in subsection (c) of Section 404 as follows:

(1) Conrail is prohibited, absent insolvency, from liquidating, dissolving or filing for relief under bankruptcy laws.

(2) Conrail is prohibited from selling, leasing, transferring or otherwise disposing of substantially all of its assets to any entity other than a wholly-owned subsidiary of Conrail.

(3) Conrail and its subsidiaries are prohibited from merging or consolidating with or into any other entity unless after giving effect to such merger or consolidation Conrail is fully in compliance with all of its obligations enumerated in Section 404 and all of such obligations continue to apply to the surviving entity in such merger or consolidation.

(4) In connection with the financing of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser, Conrail is prohibited from (a) using its cash or cash equivalents other than in connection with transactions with the Federal Government, the Conrail ESOP or Conrail's employees contemplated by the Purchase Agreement or (b) subjecting its or its subsidiaries' assets to any pledge, lien, mortgage or other security interest.

(5) Conrail is prohibited from (a) declaring or paying any dividend with respect to its common stock in cash or other assets (other than dividends payable solely in shares of such stock); (b) applying or setting aside any of its assets to the purchase, redemption or other acquisition or retirement of any shares of its common stock; or (c) making any other distribution, by reduction of capital or otherwise, with respect thereto (each a "common stock payment") unless such common stock payment is (a) made entirely in cash; (b) immediately after giving effect thereto, the cumulative amount of all common stock payments made since the closing date does not exceed 40% of the cumulative net income of Conrail which has accrued since such date minus the cumulative amount of all preferred stock payments (as defined in subsection (c)(6) of Section 404) made subsequent to the closing date; and (c) immediately after giving effect thereto, Conrail has cash and cash equivalents on hand of not less than $500,000,000.

(6) Similarly, Conrail is prohibited from (a) declaring or paying any dividends with respect to any outstanding shares of preferred stock in cash or other assets (other than dividends payable solely in shares of such stock); (b) applying or setting aside any of its assets to the purchase, redemption or other acquisition or retirement of any outstanding shares of preferred stock; or (c) making any other distribution, by reduction of capital or otherwise, with respect to any outstanding shares of preferred stock (each, a "preferred stock payment") unless such preferred stock payment is (a) made entirely in cash; (b) immediately after giving effect thereto, the cumulative amount of all common stock payments and all preferred stock payments since the closing date does not exceed the cumulative net income of Conrail which has accrued since such date; and (c) immediately after giving effect thereto Conrail has cash and cash equivalents on hand of not less than $500,000,000.

(7) If Conrail is in default in its obligations under Section 404(b)(6) of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, to make certain levels of capital expenditures, no common stock payments may be made by Conrail until it is once again in compliance with the requirements of such section.

(8) Conrail is prohibited from obtaining a reversion of any excess assets held in the trust or a successor trust maintained with the Conrail supplemental pension plan or any successor plan, and Conrail is prohibited from terminating its supplemental pension plan.

(9) Conrail is prohibited from amending, modifying, rescinding or revoking any provision of its articles of incorporation relating to the relative rights, preferences and limitations of the common stock of Conrail acquired by the Purchaser on the closing date. This provision precludes Conrail from altering its articles of incorporation to provide any of such shares with preferential rights; however, it is not intended to prevent Conrail from authorizing and issuing classes or series of preferred stock.

Subsection (d)(1) provides that, with the exception of certain specifically identified sections (such as subsection 404(b)(9) requiring Conrail to maintain its Philadelphia headquarters and its Altoona, Pennsylvania locomotive shop and car repair shop), the obligations of Conrail in subsections (b) and (c) of Section 404 apply equally to the Purchaser on a consolidated basis until such time as the Purchaser may be merged into Conrail. This subsection prevents the Purchaser from circumventing the obligations applicable to Conrail under the Act by conducting forbidden transactions at the Purchaser level. Paragraph (2) of this subsection further provides that prior to the contemplated merger of the Purchaser into Conrail, the Purchaser and affiliates of the Purchaser other than Conrail and its subsidiaries may enter into transactions with Conrail and its subsidiaries only if such transactions are fair to Conrail and are similar to other transactions between Conrail and persons not affiliated with Conrail or the Purchaser.

Subsection (d)(3) further restricts the ability of the Purchaser to enter into transactions with Conrail by prohibiting any transfer of any obligation of the Purchaser or its other affiliates to Conrail or any subsidiary in an amount greater than the value to Conrail of such transfer, any loans or advances by Conrail or its subsidiaries to the Purchaser and its other affiliates, the acquisition by Conrail or any subsidiary of stock, obligations or other securities of the Purchaser or its other affiliates, capital contributions to or investments in or guarantees of any debt or obligations of the Purchaser or its other affiliates by Conrail or its subsidiaries and assignments of any right to receive income for a consideration of less than such right by Conrail or any subsidiary to the Purchaser or any of its affiliates.

Subsection (e) of this section insures that prior to the aforementioned merger the Purchaser will continue to hold all of the outstanding voting stock of Conrail. More specifically, subsection (e) provides that the Purchaser may not transfer or pledge any of its right, title and interest in any shares of the common stock of Conrail acquired from the Federal Government pursuant to the Purchase Agreement to an other party except in connection with the merger of the Purchaser into Conrail and prohibits Conrail from issuing or contracting to issue any shares of common stock or other voting stock or securities convertible into any common or other voting stock or Conrail, whether by way of rights, options, warrants or otherwise. In addition, subsection (e) prohibits the Purchaser from acquiring any shares of preferred stock of Conrail.

Subsection (f) provides that the requirements of Section 404 are to be interpreted in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and that the acquisition by the Purchaser of the Federal Government's interest in the common stock of Conrail is to be accounted for as a recapitalization of Conrail with a 100% revaluation of Conrail's assets and liabilities based on the fair value of its new capital structure.

Subsection (g) allows the Secretary of Transportation, upon application by Conrail or the Purchaser, to waive any provision of Section 404 if the Secretary determines in writing that such waiver does not impair continued rail service by Conrail and its subsidiaries and will not result in a material reduction in the financial strength of Conrail and its subsidiaries. The subsection further requires the Secretary to transmit to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation any determination made under this subsection and provides that no waiver under the subsection will be effective for a period of 45 days following the transmittal of such to these House and Senate Committees.

Section 108.—Applicability of certain laws to the sale of conrail

This section amends Section 408 of the 3-R Act which, among other things, currently provides that no sale of Conrail's stock or assets is to be subject to judicial review or to review by the ICC, to provide that the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser pursuant to the Purchase Agreement will be subject to review before the Special Court only and that no aspect of the sale shall be subject to any other form of judicial or administrative review.

Section 109.—Labor protection

This section of the Act establishes that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the benefit schedule prescribed by the Secretary of Labor under Section 701(a)(2) of the 3-R Act will continue in force and effect after the sale of Conrail to the Purchaser until superseded by an agreement between Conrail and its labor representatives. In addition, this section provides that Conrail shall be responsible for funding all benefits under such benefit schedule immediately after the sale date and the Federal Government will have no liability for any such benefits after such date. With this change, the Federal Government will no longer be responsible for paying labor protection payments to Conrail employees terminated subsequent to the closing date.

Section 110.—Special court jurisdiction

This section amends Section 1152 of NERSA to extend the jurisdiction of the Special Court to review any action related to the enforcement, interpretation or constitutionality of any provision of the Conrail Public Sale Act of 1986, the enforcement of the Purchase Agreement by the Federal Government, the Purchaser or Conrail and the enforcement of any ancillary agreements by those parties who entered into such agreements in accordance with the Purchase Agreement.

The Special Court is a three-judge Federal district court. It was established pursuant to the 3-R Act to conduct all of the judicial proceedings related to the final system plan, which is the plan pursuant to which Conrail was created in 1976. In turn, NERSA extended the Special Court's jurisdiction to actions related to NERSA because of the court's experience and expertise in matters dealing with Conrail. This section extends the court's jurisdiction to actions related to this Act in order to take additional advantage of the court's expertise.

This section also amends Section 1152 by adding a new subsection allowing a party who believes he has suffered direct economic injury as a result of an alleged violation of a provision of subsections (b), (c), (d) or (e) of Section 404 of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act, to file a petition with the Secretary of Transportation seeking enforcement of such provision. If the Secretary decides to investigate the petition, after notice and investigation the Secretary shall make a final decision on the petition within sixty days. If the Secretary finds that one of the aforementioned statutory provisions has been violated and the complainant has suffered direct economic injury as a result, the Secretary shall enter an order directing the party in violation to comply with the provision in question. On appeal to the Special Court, any decision by the Secretary shall be upheld unless found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion or otherwise not in accordance with law.

The public interest obligations set forth in Section 404(b), (c), (d), and (e) are intended to benefit a number of parties including shippers, employees and other railroads. Accordingly, these parties have an interest in seeing that these obligations are not violated. In view of this, it is appropriate for such parties to play some role in the enforcement of these statutory provisions. However, there is a danger of facilitating the bringing of unwarranted suits against the Purchaser or Conrail. Subsection (e) balances these concerns by allowing parties to seek enforcement of the aforementioned statutory obligations, but requiring them to act first through the Secretary.

The Act contains no provision immunizing the sale of the Federal Government's interest in the common stock of Conrail to the Purchaser from any antitrust law of the United States. Such a legislative provision is unnecessary because the Purchaser is not a railroad operating or holding company. The antitrust laws of the United States will be fully applicable to Conrail and the Purchaser.

Section 111.—Applicability of other laws

This section amends Section 1168(a) of NERSA to clarify that certain federal laws are not applicable to actions taken to negotiate, approve or implement the sale of Conrail pursuant to the Purchase Agreement. It does this by striking the language "service transfers" and substituting "the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail."

Section 1168(a) exempts the sale of Conrail from certain federal laws in order to avoid extensive delays in the sale process. In originally drafting this provision of NERSA, Congress intended the exemption to apply to either a sale by means of stock transfer or one by means of an assets transfer. The term "service transfers" was used to refer to both types of transfers; however, it was not specifically defined in NERSA. Because it was not defined, its applicability to a sale of the common stock of Conrail could be questioned at this time. To avoid such questions, this section of the Act amends Section 1168(a) to refer specifically to a sale of the Federal Government's interest in the common stock of Conrail.

Section 112.—Responsibility of ESOP fiduciaries

This section amends subparagraphs (A) and (C) of Section 216(f)(8) of the 3-R Act to explicitly extend the immunity against civil liability or trustees and other persons with responsibility for the Conrail ESOP provided by such section to actions taken in connection with the implementation of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail, including any such sale, exchange, valuation or disposition of assets of the Conrail ESOP and related trust assets or the assets of Conrail Equity Corporation, or as otherwise contemplated by the Purchase Agreement. The section further clarifies that this immunity exists regardless of whether such actions take place before or subsequent to the sale date.

Section 113—Qualification, review and valuation of the ESOP

This section amends Subsection 216(f) of the 3-R Act by adding two paragraphs.

The first paragraph ensures that ESOP participants will incur no federal tax liability in connection with the contributions to and allocations of shares within the ESOP contemplated by the Purchase Agreement. Instead, such liability will be incurred when the ESOP assets are distributed to the members.

The second paragraph exempts from federal and state laws related to the approval and issuance and sale of securities the issuance and sale or contribution of securities of the Purchaser, Conrail or Conrail Equity Corporation to fulfill arrangements with Conrail's employees and the distribution of any such securities from the ESOP and the related trust in connection with the implementation of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser or as otherwise contemplated by the Purchase Agreement.

The Conrail ESOP was established pursuant to the USRA Amendments of 1978 (Public Law 95-566) (the "1978 Amendments"), which required the ESOP as a condition to additional funding of Conrail. Further, Section 216(f)(8) of the 3-R Act, as added by the 1978 Amendments, provided for the creation of Conrail Equity Corporation as a Conrail subsidiary and set forth the basic structure and operation of the ESOP, including the plan for annual contributions and a date for distribution of the ESOP participant's interest.

Conrail Equity Corporation now holds a substantial beneficial interest in Conrail on behalf of approximately 80,000 participants in the ESOP. Participations in the ESOP include Conrail employees represented by a rail union ("Agreement Employees"), Conrail employees not represented by a union ("Non-Agreement Employees"), retired Conrail employees and designated beneficiaries of deceased Conrail employees. Beginning in 1980, Conrail has made annual contributions to the ESOP of shares of Conrail Equity Corporation preferred stock, representing 10% of the total Conrail Equity Corporation preferred. This preferred stock is convertible to Conrail common stock on a 1-to-1 basis, so that in 1991 when all the stock would have been converted and distributed to the employees, the ESOP would have enough shares of Conrail common stock to represent 15% of the total. Under the terms of the Purchase Agreement, the Purchaser has agreed to pay up to $274 million from funds raised in the public offering of its common stock to the trustee of the Conrail ESOP in order to buy out that portion of the ESOP's 15% beneficial interest in Conrail common stock which ESOP participants elect to sell.

TITLE II—TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS AND REPEALS

Section 201

This section repeals or amends various provisions of the 3-R Act in order to reflect the implementation of the sale of the Federal Governments interest in Conrail to the Purchaser pursuant to the Purchase Agreement and Conrail's conversion to a privately-owned railroad pursuant thereto. Specifically, this section:

(1) Amends Section 102 of the 3-R Act by adding new definitions of "closing date," "ESOP," "Purchase Agreement" and "Purchaser" from this Act.

(2) Repeals Subsections (a) and (b) of Section 214, which authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Transporatation and the Rail Service Planning Office of the ICC to perform certain Conrail-related functions.

(3) Amends Subsection (e) of Section 217 to clarify that while Conrail retains the right to collect any accounts receivable attributable to delays in reimbursement form certain transferred commuter authorities, Conrail is not statutorily required to collect such accounts.

(4) Repeals Sections 405, 406, 407, 409, 410, 411, 412, and 713, which contain various no-longer-relevant provisions relating to the Conrail sale process. More specfically, (a) Section 405 provided for the possible sale of Conrail by means of the transfer of its assets and service responsibilities; (b) Section 406 set forth the criteria that a sale of Conrail under Section 405 would be required to meet; (c) Section 407 provided for public comment and Congressional review of a sale of Conrail under Section 405; (d) Section 409 provided that any transfer of Conrail's assets and service responsibilities under Section 408 would be deemed an assignment of all obligations under any applicable agreements or leases with respect to such rail assets (Section 408, prior to the amendments effected by this Act, provided for the transfer of Conrail's assets and service responsibilities under certain circumstances); (e) Section 410 directed Conrail in January 1982 to identify and sell any of its subsidiaries) other than Conrail Equity Corporation) that did not operate at a profit; (f) Section 411 provided for the negotiation of implementing agreements to govern the transfer of employees along with any transfer of Conrail assets and service responsibilities under Title IV of the 3-R Act; (g) Section 412 provided for New York Dock labor protection for employees adversely affected by any sale of Conrail under Title IV of the 3-R Act; and (h) Section 713 authorized appropriations for the payment of Conrail labor protection and termination allowances as provided by Sections 701 and 702 of the 3-R Act prior to the amendments effected by this Act.

Section 202.—Amendments and repeals of other rail laws

This section amends or repeals non-3-R Act provisions of law effective, pursuant to the provisions of Section 404 of this Act, on the closing date of the sale. The changes are intended to reflect Conrail's conversion to a privately-owned railroad on that date. Specifically , this section:

(1) Amends Section 1135(a) of NERSA by inserting definitions of "Purchase Agreements", and "Purchaser" from this Act.

(2) Repeals Section 1154 of NERSA, which subordinated all U.S. claims against Conrail to any other valid claim.

(3) Repeals Section 1161 of NERSA, which established a government role and procedure for disposition of Conrail's light density lines.

(4) Repeals Section 1166 of NERSA, which provides that the ICC may approve the grant of trackage rights to any terminal railroad over Conrail lines in the City of Philadelphia.

(5) Repeals Section 1167(c) of NERSA, which directed the clerk of the Special Court in August 1981 to transfer to the Department of Transportation the Series B preferred stock and common stock of Conrail that was on deposit with the Special Court.

(6) Amends Section 501(8) of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976 (the "4-R Act") to delete that part of the definition of "restructuring" that refers to certain transfers of rail services by Conrail to other railroads or entities.

(7) Amends Section 505 of the 4-R Act to eliminate the priority for preference share monies accorded to certain transfers of rail services by Conrail to other railroads or entities.

(8) Repeals Subsection (b)(1) of Section 509 of the the 4-R Act, which provides that $200,000,000 of the funds appropriated under the preference share program shall be transferred for use in implementing the Conrail workforce reduction program established pursuant to Section 702 of the 3-R Act.

(9) Amends subsection (e) of Section 511 of the 4-R Act to eliminate the set-aside of loan guarantee monies for use in the improvement of the Northeast Rail Corridor, which was transferred to the National Railroad Passenger Corporation pursuant to the 3-R Act.

(10) Repeals Section 402 of the Rail Safety and Service Improvement Act of 1982, which provides that any financially responsible person shall be eligible to apply for preference share monies under Section 505 of the 4-R Act in order to provide common carrier rail service on rail lines abandoned by Conrail.

(11) Amends Section 1005(b)(1) of the Rail Passenger Service Act to eliminate the reference to Conrail in connection with the promotion of private sector passenger corridors.

(12) Amends Section 10362(b)(7)(A) of Title 49, United States Code, to eliminate the reference to Conrail from the duties of the ICC's Rail Services Planning Office.

(13) Amends Section 332(d) of Title 49, United States Code, to eliminate the reference to Conrail from the list of entities directed to provide information to the Department of Transportation's Minority Resources Center.

Section 203.—Effect of repeals

This section provides that all repeals under the Act of appropriations provisions in various statutes are made without prejudice to the continued availability of funds appropriated under such provisions before the effective date of the repeal.

TITLE III—REVENUE PROVISIONS

Section 301.—Tax treatment

This section provides generally that, except as provided in Title III of this Act, nothing in the Act or in any amendment of any other statute made by the Act affects the federal tax treatment of the Purchaser, Conrail or any affiliated group of which Conrail is a member. The section then sets forth certain specific tax consequences of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail pursuant to the Purchase Agreement. More specifically, the section provides that:

(1) All Conrail net operating loss, capital loss and credits under the Internal Revenue Code attributable to any taxable year ending on or before the closing date are terminated as of the closing date and may not be carried forward to any taxable year beginning thereafter.

(2) No amount shall be included in the gross income of Conrail, the Purchaser or any other person and no basis adjustment in the assets of Conrail will be made by reason of the cancellation of the debt and preferred stock held by the Federal Government in Conrail in connection with the Purchase Agreement and the recapitalization provided for by Section 402 of the 3-R Act, as amended by this Act.

(3) The adjusted basis of Conrail's assets will not be increased or decreased by any adjustment relating to any taxable year ending on or prior to the closing date of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser.

(4) The current taxable year of Conrail will be closed as of the closing date. Thereafter, taxable years of Conrail will close on December 31 of each year until otherwise required or permitted under applicable law or regulations.

(5) For purposes of Section 316 of the Internal Revenue Code, as of the closing date any deficit in accumulated earnings and profits of Conrail will be eliminated.

Section 302.—Definition of Conrail

This section sets forth a definition of "Conrail" for purposes of Title III of this Act which clarifies that such term includes any corporation which was a subsidiary of Conrail immediately before its acquisition by the Purchaser.

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 401.—Common carrier status of Conrail after sale

This section states that Conrail's status as a rail carrier under Title 49, United States Code, will not be affected by virtue of the sale. Further, it states that the Purchaser will not be converted into a rail carrier as a result solely of its purchase of Conrail.

Section 402.—Separability

This section states that if any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to any other persons or circumstances shall not be affected by that invalidation.

Section 403.—Effect on Contracts

This section states that the sale of Conrail to the Purchaser shall not affect Conrail's obligation to carry out Conrail's transportation contracts, equipment leases, equipment trusts and conditional sales agreements in accordance with their terms. Under normal rules of contract law, the sale of Conrail stock would not have any effect on Conrail's obligations to honor the terms and conditions of its contracts and agreements. Nevertheless, this section has been included to make clear that the sale will not adversely affect such contracts and agreements.

Section 404.—Effective dates

Subsection (a) of this section states that, except as provided in subsection (b), provisions of the Act and the amendments to other statutes made by the Act are to take effect immediately upon the date of enactment. Subsection (b) sets forth certain exceptions to the general rule stated in subsection (a). More specifically, the following sections are specified as taking effect on the closing date of the sale of the Federal Government's interest in Conrail to the Purchaser:

(1) Section 107, which contains the public interest obligations applicable to Conrail and the Purchaser following the sale date.

(2) Section 109, which obligates Conrail to assume responsibility for certain employee protection payments under Section 701 of the 3-R Act upon the closing date.

(3) Section 201, which repeals or amends various provisions of the 3-R Act, except that subsection (a) of Section 201, which adds certain definitions to the 3-R Act, is effective as of the date of enactment of this Act.

(4) Section 202, which repeals and amends various provisions of other statutes applicable to Conrail, except that subsection (a) of Section 202, which sets forth various definitions related to this Act to be inserted into NERSA, is effective as of the date of enactment of this Act.

LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT TO WORK ON INTERNATIONAL WATER RESOURCE ACTIVITIES

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, in Africa the drought may be over, but 19 million people are still hungry. Sending more money and food can be helpful in the short term. However, developing a reliable domestic agriculture is essential for any long-term solutions.

Improving water resource management capabilities is one way famine-affected countries can promote agricultural productivity. The United States can help provide solutions to famine throughout the world by offering technical assistance in developing irrigation and water supply projects.

Today, I am introducing legislation to give the Department of the Interior the authority to work in the U.S. territories and commonwealths and in foreign countries on water resource projects. The bill gives priority to efforts which will help alleviate drought and famine, encourage indigenous food production, improve agricultural infrastructure, and the efficient use of water resources.

The legislation stems from oversight hearings of the Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources at which representatives from the Department and private voluntary organizations expressed the need for such legislation. As witnesses from the Environmental Policy Institute, Africa Tomorrow and Oxfam testified, there is a critical need for small-scale, low risk, environmentally sound water resource projects in drought-affected countries. This bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to work on such projects in famine-affected nations or U.S. territories or commonwealths.

The bill encourages the Department to promote environmentally sound solutions based on the most up-to-date planning approaches. We do not want to encourage the Department to promote construction of outdated "white elephant" water projects.

The bill also directs the Secretary to make every reasonable effort to comply with the appropriate provisions of the National Environmental Policy Act and the Water Resources Planning Act. Just as the Secretary has to utilize certain principles and standards for planning water resource projects in the United States, this bill directs the Secretary to similarly comply with these guidelines when working outside the national domain.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources, I intend to give this legislation early consideration. Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this legislation.

WHAT WORKS: RESEARCH ABOUT TEACHING AND LEARNING

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, Secretary William J. Bennett and the U.S. Department of Education recently released its latest report entitled, "What Works: Research About Teaching and Learning." This brief report follows a distinguished line of U.S. Department of Education publications focusing America's attention on education. These reports on education, I contend, provide the general public with information to "promote the cause of education throughout the country," as Secretary Bennett concludes in the foreword of "What Works." I commend the U.S. Department of Education for promoting these four reports and keeping educational debate in the forefront.

Commencing in 1983 with "A Nation At Risk: The Imperative for Educational Reform," the National Commission on Excellence in Education accepted the challenge of reviewing the quality of our educational system and offering practical methods to enhance and improve it. This report and others of its kind developed by the private and public sector have served to challenge educators, families, public officials, and students as we transform into a lifelong learning society in a high-tech information age. In light of recent statistics indicating improvement of our youngsters' scholastic test scores alone, this report, many instances, certainly has been a successful and useful tool for individual schools, school boards, State legislators and Congress.

Realizing that libraries play a unique role in our lifelong learning society, in 1984 the Department issued, "Alliance for Excellence: Librarians Respond to A Nation At Risk." There is no doubt that libraries, large and small, can be of real educational service to learners at any age or at any academic level. I believe libraries have a uniquely important capacity to assist in eradicating literacy in our country.

"Becoming a Nation of Readers: The Report of the Commission on Reading," sponsored by the U.S. Department of Education's National Institute of Education in 1985, set forth recommendations to instill in students of all ages quality reading skills. This well-orchestrated report stresses the early development of reading for our children as a constructive foundation for their listening, speaking, and writing skills. Equally important elements in becoming a nation of readers are disciplined and orderly schools with strong instructional leadership. "Becoming a Nation of Readers" clearly reflects and recognizes the contribution of educational research on educational policy and improvement.

"What Works" like the "A Nation At Risk" report is addressed to the American people to draw positive attention to education. The Washington Post in a recent article entitled "Bennett's Booklet: A Classic Waste," misses in its assessment of the practicality of the report. "What Works," unlike other educational publications previously released, does not direct specific attention to problems in our educational system. Rather, it takes the high road to point out viable solutions to 41 educational situations which research shows can work.

"What Works" was primarily written and targeted at the layman, not educational researchers per se. The publication condenses a massive volume of scholarly research material on education and stresses the importance of learning at home with commonsense methods for the classroom. In 1983, "A Nation At Risk" recommended a new emphasis on the basics, homework, foreign language, and time spent in the classroom, to name a few, and "What Works" has collected data to reflect these ideas and support it with illustrative research findings.

Heightening national awareness and concern for our educational system can only assist in enhancing and improving it today and for future generations. I commend the contribution of the U.S. Department of Education toward this goal.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF BERKELEY CARROLL STREET SCHOOL

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 100th anniversary of the Berkeley Carroll Street School.

The school was originally chartered as the Berkeley Institute on April 12, 1886. In 1982, the Berkeley Institute merged with the Carroll Street School, which was founded in 1965, and took on its current name. Today, the Berkeley Carroll Street School, which is located in the Park Slope section of Brooklyn, serves more than 500 students who attend classes from pre-school through high school.

Over the past 100 years the school has been firmly committed to excellence in education. Many graduates have gone on to college and become leaders in the Brooklyn community. I applaud the Berkeley Carroll Street School on its accomplishments during the preceding 100 years and look forward to celebrating the school's 150th anniversary in the year 2036—when many of today's Berkeley Carroll students will be leaders in both our Brooklyn community and in our Nation.

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ AT UNIVERSITY OF THE PHILIPPINES

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I recently returned from the Philippines as part of a delegation of the Foreign Affairs Committee. While in Manila, I had the distinct honor of listening to an eloquent speech by my distinguished colleague from New York, STEPHEN J. SOLARZ.

I found Mr. SOLARZ' statements at the University of the Philippines College of Law to be a particularly insightful and clearly enunciated analysis of the situation in that nation. His touching words and in-depth interpretation of the recent democratic triumph of the Filipino people should be read by every Member of Congress. I include the text of his presentation for the RECORD.

A RENDEZVOUS WITH DEMOCRACY: THE MIRACLE IN MANILA

My Dear Filipino Friends, how good it is to be back in a free Philippines. Over the last few weeks I watched with millions of other Americans the stirring sight of a people proudly proclaiming their commitment to freedom and peacefully reclaiming their democratic birthright. My only regret was that I could not be here with you to share in that shining moment.

Actually, I was planning to come immediately after the election. But when I inquired—at the suggestion of some of my Filipino friends—about the arrangements for my security, I was told not to worry because the Marcos government had already agreed to protect me. With that reassurance, I promptly canceled my trip. With guardians like Fabian Ver, I figured, who needs enemies?

Now I have come—on a proud pilgrimage—to bring the heartfelt congratulations of our Nation to President Aquino and to you, the people of the Philippines, for your stunning triumph over tyranny.

You have pulled down the soiled rag of repression and raised anew the banner of freedom.

After a long night of tyranny, the sun of liberty shines again.

Every time I come to the Philippines, no matter how joyful the occasion, I cannot help but remember the sojourn of sorrow that I made some 30 months ago.

At that tragic time, Ninoy's blood still lay on the tarmac of the Manila Airport.

The tears of his family, his friends, and his admirers were not yet dry.

His courageous vow to suffer with his people, which he uttered before his departure from the United States, still rang in my ears.

I had left the Philippines the day before Ninoy was assassinated. News of his murder reached me in Bangkok, and I immediately canceled the rest of my trip and flew back to Manila to pay my respects to his family and friends.

Ninoy had, after all, announced publicly, for the first time, his plans to return to the Philippines in his testimony before my subcommittee only six weeks earlier, and I thought it terribly important to let my Filipino friends know that there were Americans who shared their anguish over the loss of their fallen leader.

I remember going to Ninoy's home, where his family had insisted that his blood-soaked body lie in an open casket, so that the Filipino people could see for themselves what a brutal regime had done to their beloved leader.

I remember the thousands of Filipinos—young and old, rich and poor, men and women—waiting patiently on long lines outside of his home to pay homage to this latest in a long list of Filipino martyrs.

I remember his mother—his remarkable mother—Dona Aurora, who told me how she had pleaded with her son not to return, and how he had told her, "I would rather die a meaningful death than lead a meaningless life."

And I remember having dinner that evening with his sisters, Tessie and Lupita, and his friends, Doy and Soc, and how, after the meal was over, everyone there joined in singing, "The Impossible Dream."

Now, two and a half years later, we can say for certain what we hoped all along. The impossible dream has come true. Ninoy did not die in vain.

In one of the political miracles of our time, his dream has been resurrected by the courageous commitment of the Filipino people to the values for which he gave his life.

Through the miracle of modern communications, millions of people throughout America watched with awe and amazement as you put your lives on the line for democracy.

Like many Americans, I alternately trembled and thrilled at the human and political drama unfolding before my eyes.

I trembled with fear at the possibilities for massive bloodshed and even civil war.

But I thrilled at the sight of nuns and ordinary people turning back tanks with their prayers and their presence.

You have left an imperishable impression on the collective memory of the American people.

It was not simply that you sought a more just society. It was that you were willing to risk "your lives, your fortune, and your sacred honor" to achieve it.

It was not simply that you destroyed the dictatorship. It was that you replaced it with democracy.

It was not simply that you overthrew the government. It was that you did it peacefully.

You learned well the lesson imparted by Manuel Quezon in a speech at the University of the Philippines only two weeks before the Japanese attack against your country, when he said, "only those who know how to suffer and die in order to be free are worthy of that freedom."

Those who rule by the sword underestimate the power of the spirit. Forty years ago, Joseph Stalin cynically asked, "how many divisions does the people have?"

Last week we found the answer to that question on the streets of Manila. For the first time in history—in response to the call of the church—it was the people who protected the army rather than the army who protected the people.

You were privileged to participate in one of the few authentic democratic revolutions of our time. And so, it can truly be said of the Filipino people, if I can paraphrase what Franklin Delano Roosevelt once said of the American people, "to some generation . . . much is expected. This generation of Filipinos has a rendezvous with democracy."

Your triumph over the forces of repression was an event of profound significance not only for the Filipino people, but also for the United States and the friends of freedom around the world.

You showed how deeply rooted is the desire for democracy in developing, as well as developed, nations.

You demonstrated that peaceful change is possible in dictatorships as well as democracies.

And you proved that you were capable of bringing down the dictatorship on your own.

The American people were on your side, although the same cannot be said of everyone. Indeed, as the events in Manila reached their climax and the fate of your nation hung in the balance, the United States swung its support to Cory Aquino, while the Soviet Union stood behind Ferdinand Marcos.

And yet it was not we who defended the ballot boxes with our lives, you did.

It was not we who surrounded Camp Crame. You did.

It was not we who turned back the tanks—with nuns and non-violence. You did.

It is not you who are in our debt. It is we who must feel—"Utang Na Lowohb."

But it is not just the people of the United States who gloried in your victory. For the rest of time, so long as men and women yearn to be free, people will draw inspiration from your heroic achievement.

When the democratic opposition in South Korea wonders whether the generals will ever relinquish power, their friends abroad can say, "Don't forget the Philippines."

When the Taiwanese people despair, after four decades of martial law, they can revive their hopes by saying, "Don't forget the Philippines."

When the peaceful opposition in Chile, squeezed between the repression of the right and the terrorism of the left, tries to create a middle way, they can take heart in the words, "Don't forget the Philippines."

When the black majority in South Africa, is temporarily turned back in its long march to freedom, they can renew their strength by saying, "Don't forget the Philippines."

When the peaceful partisans of solidarnosc in Poland, and the Pope who has been both their protector and promoter, wonder whether there is a future for freedom in their country, they can take heart from the thought, "Don't forget the Philippines."

Above all else, however, this has been a movement of the Filipino people, by the Filipino people, and for the Filipino people. And it is on the basis of what it means for the Philippines that its historic significance will ultimately be determined.

The primary credit must necessarily go to millions of ordinary Filipinos, whose devotion to democracy made possible the elimination of dictatorship. But there were individual and institutional heroes whose contribution will be remembered so long as men and women seek freedom.

First and foremost, there was President Aquino—how terrific it sounds to use that title before her name—the self-styled housewife who embodied and who so eloquently expressed the aspirations of her people for a restoration of democracy. Her courage and determination call to mind a paraphrase of Ralph Waldo Emerson's prophetic words, "If a single woman plant herself indomitably on her instincts and there abide, the whole world will come round to her."

Because of all that she has accomplished, because of everything that she symbolizes, and because she has won a special place in the history of the twentieth century and the hearts of the American people, I have been asked by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Thomas P. O'Neill, to extend an invitation to President Aquino to address a joint session of the Congress of the United States.

Second, there was Vice President Laurel, who chose to give up his own Presidential ambitions for the sake of unity against the dicatorship, and whose vast expertise will be a great asset to the new government.

Third, there were the half million citizen volunteers of Namfrel, who forced the dictatorship to choose between cheating in the open and not cheating at all. President Reagan did not exaggerate when he said on January 30th that Namfrel "Makes Americans proud to have the Republic of the Philippines as a friend and ally."

Fourth, there was the Catholic Church, which sanctified participation in the electoral process and then—in a clarion call conscience—urged the Filipino people to support through non-violent means the struggle for freedom.

Fifth, there was Evelio Javier, and hundreds like him, who risked all for the sake of democracy and ended losing their lives for it. Their sacrifice calls to mind the poignant words of Jose Rizal, who once wrote, "I die without seeing the day dawning on my country. . . . You who will see it, greet it. . . . And forget not those who fell during the night."

Finally, at the critical hour, because credit must be given where credit is due, tipping the balance toward democracy, where Juan Ponce Enrile and Fidel Ramos, who risked their lives to take a stand for freedom.

But ultimately, the good works of all of these individuals and institutions rested upon the indestructible foundation of "people power."

By the millions, Filipinos demonstrated their desire for democracy. For the most part, we will never know the names of these peaceful foot soldiers in the legions of freedom. The only record they leave to history are the videotapes that show their earnest faces and outstretched hands, flashing the laban sign.

Their struggle recalls the words of Robert Kennedy in South Africa 20 years ago, "it is from the numberless diverse acts of courage and belief that human history is shaped. Each time a man stands up for an ideal, or acts to improve the lot of others, or strikes out against injustice, he sends forth a tiny ripple of hope, and crossing each other from a million different centers of energy and daring, those ripples build a current which can sweep down the mightiest wages of oppression and resistance."

I have come here today not simply to honor these acts of courage and belief, but to talk about the future and what can be done to secure it.

I want to speak to you from my heart. As someone who enlisted in your cause long before it captured the attention and admiration of the world, as someone whose own life in the last few years has been intimately bound up in your historic struggle for freedom, I have thought long and hard about the meaning of your triumph. I have thought, too, about what needs to be done to make sure that this moment of hope is transformed into an enduring foundation of freedom, rather than ending up as an evanescent episode in a long history of injustice.

The future of the Philippines is obviously a matter for the Filipino people to determine for themselves, but just as I did not hesitate, as a friend of the Filipino people, to speak up for democracy during the years of dictatorship, I hope you will understand and even forgive me if, in a spirit of friendship, I share with you my thoughts today about the future of your country.

The restoration of democracy was an antidote for years of dictatorship and decline, but it is not a panacea for the problems of the Philippines. the Communist cancer which has been spreading throughout the Philippines was the result not only of a denial of liberty, but also of centuries of economic deprivation and social injustice.

Almost 400 years after the Spanish first arrived on these shores, the truth is that the Philippines retains many of the characteristics of a semi-feudal society. The few who are rich continue to dominate the many who are poor. Nowhere else in Southeast Asia is there another country with a more inequitable distribution of income.

With the resurrection of democracy, the Filipino people have left the desert of dictatorship. But you have not yet reached the promised land of social justice and economic opportunity.

The Communist insurgency will not automatically disappear. The economy, ravaged by a decade of crony capitalism and government-led capital flight, will not instantaneously recover.

The Philippines needs fundamental democratic reforms to prevent a Communist revolution. As President Aquino herself has said:

The monopolies must be abolished.

Corruption must be eliminated.

Public confidence must be restored.

The Government must be made accountable.

Land reform must be initiated.

Rural industry must be encouraged and rural credit must be made available.

The military must be trained to protect the people rather than to abuse them.

I fear that without a profound restructuring of the social and economic life of the Philippines, leading to new opportunities for the poor to enjoy the bounty of the Nation, the fresh harvest of freedom may yet yield bitter fruit of repression.

Having succeeded in overthrowing a dictatorship cloaked in the self-righteous trappings of anti-communism, you must still meet the challenge of a Communist insurgency that poses a serious threat to your new-found freedoms.

You have only to look to the killing fields of Cambodia or the human desert that is Vietnam to know what communism would mean in the Philippines—for your political freedoms, for your economic potential, and for your religious faith.

The problems of the Philippines will require Filipino solutions. As a sovereign and independent people, only you can determine how to cope with the challenges you confront.

Yet the mystic chords of political memory have inextricably linked our two nations, and so we cannot—and we will not—remain indifferent to your fate. Having helped, in some small way to bring an end to the dictorship, America has a vital interest in the success of democracy.

I do not represent the Reagan administration. Nor can I speak for all of my colleagues in the Congress.

But I can tell you that there is extraordinary sympathy in the United States for the Filipino people and a genuine desire to be as helpful as possible to your new government as it attempts to deal with the many problems it confronts.

I have come here primarily to find out from your new leaders how the United States can be most constructive in the critical days ahead. Based on the discussions and consultations I have already had both in Manila and Washington, I believe the United States should embark upon the following six-point program for the Philippines:

1. We should do everything possible to help the Philippine Government recover the resources the Marcoses and their cronies have brought to the United States. After two decades of privilege and plunder, the time has come to return these ill-gotten gains to the Filipino people from whose pockets they were stolen and swindled. This is more than a matter of simple justice. It is also a matter of simple arithmetic.

The value of the real estate empire controlled by the Marcoses in the New York City area alone is worth roughly twice the annual level of American economic aid to your country. Better it should be used for the poor people of Manila than the Marcoses in Manhattan.

2. Recognizing the dire condition of the Philippine economy and the need for an immediate infusion of capital, the United States should rapidly disperse the almost $200 million in various forms of economic aid we have already appropriated for the Philippines. Such a step would not only help the Government to stabilize the economy, but would encourage private investors and international financial institutions to place their confidence in the Philippines.

3. The Government of the Philippines, in conjunction with the United States and other donor countries, should immediately convene a high-level working group to formulate a comprehensive plan for the economic recovery and revitalization of the Philippines.

4. The United States and other nations in a position to help should commit themselves to a multi-year, multi-lateral foreign assistance program, providing for a substantial and significant increase in the level of their aid, if the Government of the Philippines commits itself to carrying out an agreed-upon plan for revitalizing the economy.

Without a plan for fundamental reforms, additional aid is not likely to achieve the desired results. But without additional assistance, the resources necessary to implement fundamental reforms will not be available.

5. The United States should provide those surplus food commodities, such as dried non-fat milk, currently in U.S. stockpiles that can be used to alleviate the tragic malnutrition in some areas of the Philippines.

6. If President Aquino requests, and if the Philippine military undertakes fundamental reforms designed to eliminate corruption and an end to the systematic abuses of human rights that have done more to fuel the insurgency than to contain it, the U.S. should also be prepared to provide additional military assistance as well.

At a time when the United States faces enormous budget deficits and the necessity of cutting vitally important domestic programs, it would be a mistake to assume that such a proposal for the Philippines will meet with instantaneous approval.

Yet I am confident that the United States Government will work with unprecedented unity in order to be as helpful as we can.

If President Aquino brought the Filipino people together, she has also brought together the American people—Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans, the Congress and the administration—in support of political democracy and decency in your country. And that bodes well for the future relationship between our two nations.

In the final analysis, however, it will be what you do here, much more than what we do in Washington, that will determine the future of your country. Yet if people power can topple a tyrant, who can doubt that it can develop a democracy?

Almost 200 years ago, as the American Constitutional Convention came to an end, one of the delegates to that historic gathering, Benjamin Franklin, rose to deliver his concluding remarks. He pointed to a painting on the wall of a Sun on the horizon and said that throughout the course of the proceedings, he had wondered whether it was a rising or a setting Sun. Now that the convention had completed its work and was ready to present a Constitution to the American people, he was confident that it was a rising Sun.

Today in the Philippines, at the dawn of a new era in the history of your country, it can be truly said that your Sun is rising as well. Mabuhay Ang Pilipino!

NUCLEAR POTENTIAL

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call my colleagues' attention to a remarkable technological achievement. Yesterday our Nation became the first in history to have 100 commercially operable nuclear plants. On this historic day, we should be proud of the contribution that technology has made to our national security and that of the rest of the industrialized world. We have not only developed nuclear power for our own use, but we have shared it with the world as well.

Nuclear power did not develop accidentally in this country, nor did it fall into our laps. It took a deliberate, concerted effort on the part of several administrations, the Congress, and private industry to bring the complex technology out of the laboratory and put it to work. Why did we do it? Not because it would produce electricity "too cheap to meter," as one myth has it, but because of its tremendous potential. Glenn Seaborg, later to become Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, put it this way in 1952:

Even should the nuclear source never provide cheaper energy than the present common sources, it may still have an important future because of its advantages as a compact and almost inexhaustible source of energy, characteristics which give it advantages which no other fuel can come close to equalling, advantages which cannot be evaluated in terms of dollar value because there is no alternative way of accomplishing the same things at any price.

Nuclear energy proved itself economically. The majority of nuclear plants operating in this country today produce electricity at lower cost than fossil-fueled alternatives. Still, the ultimate reason for its development remains its virtually boundless potential, which is even more important now that we can see the end of our proven petroleum reserves and the tensions that competition for diminishing resources can cause.

GOALS FOR QUOTAS

HON. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, the administration is continuing its review of Executive Order 11246, which forbids discrimination by Federal contractors and requires them to undertake affirmative action to ensure such nondiscrimination.

Instead of focusing on equal opportunity and nondiscrimination, Department of Labor regulations focus on equal results and proportional representation through the mandatory imposition of employment goals and timetables. No finding of discrimination is necessary before the Department of Labor imposes such goals. Failure to meet the requisite goals constitutes a violation of the Executive order enforcement programs—again, even when no discrimination is alleged.

Through such administrative enforcement and judicial interpretation of the regulations, the Executive order has become a vehicle for the very racial and gender discrimination it was intended to outlaw.

The Government-imposed goals and timetables cause discrimination and otherwise operate as quotas was forcefully explained by Professor Glenn Loury, in his excellent response to a recent column by Harvard President Derek Bok.

I attach a copy of Professor Loury's column for your convenience.

[From the Washington Post]

GOALS ARE QUOTAS

(By Glenn C. Loury)

Derek Bok, in his defense of affirmative action ["Goals Aren't Quotas," op-ed, Feb. 25], makes three points:

(1) That the goals and timetables required by current regulations implementing Executive Order 11246 differ from quotas because they do not require an employer to hire a female or minority applicant who is "plainly less qualified" than a white male alternative, but do encourage "conscientious employers" to hire such applicants when their "qualifications [are] reasonably comparable to the best alternative candidates."

(2) That the use of goals contributes to the diminution of such key social problems as "jobless rates [which] exceed 40 percent for black teen-agers" and the resulting "problem for all of us that takes its daily toll through added crime, welfare payments, unemployment compensation and urban decay."

(3) That these social benefits to be derived from affirmative action are worth the admitted costs of unfairness to white males (who, he says, continue to receive "unfair advantages . . . through habits of discrimination and oversight that persist to the detriment of women and minorities"), and the possible stigma for minority and female beneficiaries engendered by the policy.

All three of these points are flawed. Let me address them one by one:

(1) The distinction that Bok draws between goals and quotas is illusory. Each involves the formulation of a numerical target for the employment of the favored groups. Each induces a change in the hiring behavior of the subject employer. And in each case that change is brought on by the employer's assessment of the consequences of failure to meet the target. Thus, one cannot distinguish a "goal" from a "quota" in those instances where the target is met; everything depends on what happens in the event of failure.

When the consequences of not meeting the target are minor, the change in hiring behavior by the subject employer will also be minor. When the penalty for failure to meet the target is severe, the change in employer behavior will be more extensive. For Derek Bok a "goal" is a target supported by weak penalties in the event it is not met, while a "quota" is a target with penalties for failure that are so severe that most employees will be induced to meet it. The distinction is one of degree, not kind.

Naturally, as a large employer with extensive government involvements, Bok prefers that his numerical targets be enforced by weak penalties. But if "quotas" imply deplorable reverse discrimination, as Bok tacitly acknowledges, then how weak must the penalties supporting a numerical target become before it turns into a "goal," and is thereby made morally acceptable? Put differently, how big must the difference in qualifications between two applicants be before they are no longer "comparable" and one of them becomes "plainly less qualified?"

Our legal and moral objection to racial discrimination against blacks is not conditional upon some minimal degree of injury being done by the act of discriminating. We believe it is wrong to treat people in that way no matter how severe the damage done thereby. Why should we reason differently when the injured party is a white male?

(2) There is not a shred of evidence that Executive Order 11246 has had a positive effect on the unemployment rate of black teen-agers, on the poverty rates affecting minority populations, on welfare dependency or on the social disruption associated with inner-city crime.

Indeed, to assert that this could be so is to contravene Bok's claim that beneficiaries of the policy are given preference only when their qualifications are "comparable" to the best alternative candidates. Most victims of the deprivation which Bok rightly decries are in no position to present qualifications comparable to those of persons not subject to the disadvantages of lower-class urban life.

The Labor Department study that Bok cites finds employment effects from the Executive Order too small to imply any meaningful impact on overall minority poverty or unemployment rates. It is a cruel hoax to suggest to the American people that the profoundly serious problems of alienation and social-economic marginality represented by the inner-city ghettos of this country can be significantly affected by a policy that bestows benefits on those who are not poor.

(3) By what reasoning or evidence does Bok conclude that the injury to white males from affirmative action "is likely to be more than offset by the unfair advantages they receive" due to ongoing discrimination against women and minorities? While this may be a plausible conclusion when considering the particular white male employees of a specific employer found to have been discriminating against women and/or minorities over a period of time, it makes no sense whatsoever when applied to white men in general.

It is a sign of how insidiously corrupting of our moral sensibilities the practice of racial preference can be that such an attribution could issue from one so committed to the cause of justice as Bok. For it implies that a white man, fresh from high school and applying for a janitor's position at Harvard, may be denied employment on the grounds that he has been the beneficiary of some generalized and unspecified discrimination against women and minorities. This conclusion, moreover, is drawn without reference to his social background or personal biography.

If all white men have benefited improperly from discrimination, why have not some white women also benefited? Would not such reasoning imply that black women should get preference over white women because the latter, while having suffered from sex discrimination, have nonetheless benefited from racial discrimination?

Finally, Bok's discussion of the problem of stigma is, at best, incomplete. He cites my own arguments in this area as carrying particular force, saying that I am one who "speaks with daunting credibility as a black who grew up on the South Side of Chicago."

Yet, my credibility to address this issue derives not from my Chicago origins but rather from my more recent experience as a black professional working in the upper reaches of a highly competitive, technically demanding profession. It was only after accepting a tenured professorship in Harvard's economics department—a professorship extended on the condition that I accept responsibilities in the Afro-American Studies department as well, and one offered despite the views of some in the economics department that I was not quite ready for such a distinguished position—that I began to learn firsthand what being an "affirmative action appointment" can mean.

It is not sufficient, when dismissing the "stigma" argument, to cite opinion polls showing that most blacks support the Executive Order as it now stands. For most blacks do not have direct experience with those environments in which the implications of being labeled an "affirmative action hire" are most debilitating. I know I speak for many blacks when I say that I resent being robbed of my opportunity to earn the highest honors my profession offers, being placed in a position where no matter what I achieve it can be said: "He would never have gotten that job if he hadn't been black."

VIEWS ON NICARAGUA

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Shirley is the mayor of Port Townsend, WA, a small community in my district that has a sister city relationship with Jalapa, Nicaragua. Jalapa is located in the northwest of Nicaragua close to the Honduran border.

In January, Mayor Shirley and a small group of fellow citizens traveled to Nicaragua and spent 2 weeks in Managua and Jalapa. What he found, and how his views changed as a result of that visit, is described persuasively in a letter Mayor Shirley has given to me.

The mayor's observations are particularly important in light of the fact he is a Republican and, in general, a supporter of the President's policies.

I submit his letter to be inserted in the RECORD, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

MARCH 12, 1986.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SWIFT: Early in the 1980s Port Townsend became "sister city" to Jalapa after local resident Doug Milholland visited Nicaragua and returned with the idea of establishing a people's diplomacy with the people of Jalapa, a town in the northern provinces that is about the size of Port Townsend. After some discussion that generated a great deal of community interest and support, the City Council passed a resolution so establishing the relationship.

Over the next year to two, small delegations of local citizens visited Jalapa, and local Port Townsend groups assembled packets of basic supplies to send to our "sister city."

In the final of 1985, I was invited to lead a delegation to Jalapa. I agreed to do so out of curiosity and out of a fondness I had developed for the Latin culture when I resided in Southern California. Our delegation included Jefferson County Commissioner Larry Dennison, and two business people who both had previously visited Central American countries. Our two-week trip was made in January, and I returned impressed by the Nicaraguans and confused by my country's approach to that nation.

I am generally known as a political conservative and I have supported much of what the current administration has proposed. But after spending two weeks in Managua and Jalapa, I can not understand why this nation has imposed an embargo and openly supports the "contras." The embargo has proven to ban basic supplies such as wheat; it has not been limited only to weapons. Certainly, the Sandinistas are socialist, and yes they have obtained some weapons from the Soviet Union. I saw some technical staff from Cuba and from other Latin nations, but at no time did I see any evidence of foreign military forces. In the northern part of the country, where Jalapa is located and most of the "contra" attacks are made, almost every civilian—even children—carry weapons, but that is to protect themselves while they harvest coffee. I am aware that our delegation was shown what our hosts wanted us to see, but we were always allowed to talk to anyone and we were frequently on our own—in Managua, in Jalapa, and en route in between.

What I saw was a people attempting to build a country, to establish economic opportunity, freedom from want; they have a great desire to develop friendly relations with the United States. This impression was gained from our delegation's purposeful and successful attempt to meet and talk with peasants of the country.

In a discussion with the Mayor of Managua, he told me that his "people no more want to become communist than the United States wants them to." If the mayor had been coached by the Sandinistas I doubt that he would have put it quite that way.

I fear that our policies toward Nicaragua and the proposed $100 million in aid to the "contras," if approved, will only be self-fulfilling. If the country does not have access to U.S. aid and support, it is probable that they will look to the Soviets and to the Cubans for even more assistance. They may indeed become communist.

Thank you for your time and attention. With best wishes, I am

Sincerely Yours,

BRENT S. SHIRLEY,
Mayor.

CLUTCH HITTER

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD an article that appeared in last Thursday's New York Times. I thought it would provide a lighter moment before we begin considering a number of pressing issues such as a Gramm-Rudman inspired budget cut and aid to the Contras.

The article talks about a contract that Frank Cashen, vice president and general manager of the New York Mets, offered to financier Felix Rohatyn to play shortstop for the Mets this season.

Mr. Rohatyn declined, and the Mets will have to struggle this year without him. But I would be remiss if I didn't note that during New York City's darkest hours in the midseventies, he came through as a clutch hitter and proved himself to be the city's MVP with the bailout that eventually saved the city.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 13, 1986]

METS' CONTRACT OFFER TO ROHATYN IS LACKING CLOUT

(By Joseph Durso)

Felix Rohatyn may be one of the heavy hitters in financial circles, but he has turned down an offer to take his swings in a new job: shortstop for the Mets.

Leaving no stone unturned in their pursuit of the pennant, the Mets sent a contract for $75,000 to Mr. Rohatyn last month and then waited to announce the signing of a celebrity shortstop. But Mr. Rohatyn declined because his age was too high (58), his last batting average too low (.089 in fraternity house softball in 1949) and the salary too skimpy. Besides, he said, he throws left-handed.

It happened just before spring training when Mr. Rohatyn was reportedly being urged to run for the United States Senate this year. He was quoted as responding: "It's just not something I could do well or be comfortable doing. Besides which, I promised the Mets I will play shortstop for them next season."

That was good enough for Frank Cashen, executive vice president and general manager of the Mets. He may have had Dwight Gooden, Gary Carter and Darryl Strawberry, which is like having money in the bank. But, at shortstop, he had only Rafael Santana and nobody in particular in reserve.

He promptly fired off a "Dear Felix" letter to Mr. Rohatyn at his office at the investment banking house of Lazard Frères and Company, at 30 Rockefeller Plaza, and got right to the point:

"Having followed your career with great interest, I was pleased to learn that you are now committed to playing shortstop for the Mets during the pending season. To this end, I have enclosed your official 1986 Uniform Player's Contract and trust the terms are satisfactory.

"Also, please note the usual information on reporting dates and conditions for spring training.

"Although Rafael Santana had a satisfactory season at shortstop in 1985 and must be considered the likely starting choice, you will be given every chance to win the job and break camp with the major league club.

"If you will sign both copies of the contract in the appropriate place and return same, I will forward them to the National League office for promulgation, ultimately returning a certified copy to you for your records. All best luck in the season up ahead."

Four days later, Mr. Rohatyn replied:

"I was thrilled to get your letter with the contract for next season. Imagine my dismay when, upon closer reflection, it now appears that I will not be able to play for you in 1986 for the following reasons:

"1) My arrangements with Lazard Frères include noncompetitive clauses. It seems to me that there is not much difference between a hostile corporate takeover raid and a high inside fastball thrown at somebody's ear. We are both in show business and I am afraid that our lawyers would feel that I should stick to our kind of show biz.

"2) I am sure that Rafael Santana is a serious, hard-working young man with a great future with your club. I shudder to think what would happen to his morale if, all of a sudden, he found a 58-year-old, left-handed shortstop on your roster. I don't want to risk creating such unrest.

"3) Last, but not least, I must come to the issue of money. Your proposed contract at $75,000 per year seems to me somewhat on the skimpy side even though I recognize that my fielding has been erratic and that in my last full season (fraternity college softball in 1949), I hit only .089.

"In addition, I should point out that your proposal is way below the minimum wage scale set by the Investment Bankers' Benevolent Association and that $75,000 is what one of my very junior partners earns in one weekend, working on a deal that doesn't even go through. Nonetheless, I do appreciate that, under the circumstances, your proposal undoubtedly appears generous to you."

Mr. Cashen, who doesn't often spring for a free agent, seemed a little downcast by the rejection.

"I really didn't feel I wanted to give him the minimum, because of who he is," he said, referring to the big-league rookie pay of $60,000. "But his experience seemed a little thin."

VOLUNTEERS OF AMERICA

HON. JIM WRIGHT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1986, Volunteers of America, one of the country's largest multipurpose human service agencies, celebrates 90 years of service to the Nation. Founded in 1896 in a small New York bowery mission, Volunteers of America has helped millions of Americans, providing human service programs for the elderly, youth, families, alcoholics, drug abusers, and the disabled.

Still dedicated to the principles established by its founders Maud and Ballington Booth, Volunteers of America has grown over the years to meet the new challenges of an ever-changing society. From its inception, VOA has sought to provide social service programs tailored to the unique needs of the communities it serves, and to effectively combine its social work with its Christian mission.

Because of its involvement in over 400 human care programs, Volunteers of America is uniquely positioned to actively respond to the needs of individual communities. At present, Volunteers of America serves over 170 communities across the United States providing programs which include maternity and adoption services, group homes for disabled adults, low-income housing for senior citizens, residential care for disturbed youth, and family counseling.

This year, March 2–9 has been designated National Volunteers of America Week in recognition of its founding. During that week, and throughout the years to come, we should remember the efforts of those who so willingly commit themselves to serving others and by doing so make all our lives better. Today, as we look forward to Volunteers of America's 90th anniversary, it is clear that organizations such as this do make a difference in all of our lives, renewing our faith in the philanthropic consciousness of the Nation, and rekindling our hope for the future.

HOW BEST TO ACHIEVE PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion in recent weeks about public opinion toward how best to achieve peace in Central America. The administration seems to have convinced itself that its policies enjoy widespread support, but it is apparent that the people of Texas do not share this delusion. I would like to enter into the RECORD the results of a recent poll taken in my home city of El Paso, TX, as well as an article describing the bemused reactions of the residents of Harlingen, TX, which has enjoyed sudden fame due to the President's claim—disputed by some—that the conflict in Central America is only a 2-day drive from their city.

The articles are as follows:

[From the El Paso (TX) Times, Mar. 16, 1986]

EL PASOANS OPPOSE GIVING AID TO REBELS, POLL INDICATES

(By Gary Scharrer)

President Reagan will find an unreceptive El Paso audience tonight when he goes on TV seeking converts in his crusade to get military aid for the Nicaraguan contras.

A majority of El Pasoans oppose giving military aid to anti-Sandinista rebels, according to a poll taken last week by K Associates. The poll shows that 51 percent of El Pasoans oppose giving military aid to the contras, 36 favor it and 13 percent were unsure.

Hispanics are even more opposed to Reagan's efforts to shore up the contras' guerrilla war against the Marxist-led Nicaraguan government. According to the poll, 58 percent of El Paso's Hispanic men and 65 percent of the Hispanic women oppose the aid request.

The contra aid question is one of 13 topics that K Associates surveyed in a phone interview of 200 registered El Paso voters.

The poll indicates that a solid majority supports the state's new basic competency test that public school teachers were required to take last week. Only 33 percent opposed the tests, even though the question explained that "some people feel that such an exam doesn't measure teaching ability and is a waste of tax dollars." The question also explained that "the stated purpose (of the test) is to help improve education."

According to the poll, 63 percent support the teacher tests. El Pasoans split on whether teachers should lose their jobs if they fail the test twice: 41 responded "Yes," compared to 48 percent "No."

The scientific poll has a 7 percent margin of error.

Most of the questions in the poll were provided by citizens to K Associates, which did the survey as a public service, said Bill Kaigh, a math and statistics professor at the University of Texas at El Paso.

"Legislators and public officials are constantly under pressure by special interest groups who back their interests with lobbyists and campaign contributions," Kaigh said. "Opinion polls give the general public a chance to offset this pressure.

"Public opinion is an essential part of democratic government, and polls express this opinion accurately." Kaigh said. "The alternative is vague impressions and the loud voices of special interests."

According to the poll, more El Pasoans prefer keeping abortion legal than banning it. Forty-two percent said they believe in keeping abortion legal under certain circumstances; 31 percent support legalized abortion and 26 percent believe all abortion should be illegal.

A majority—56 percent—favor El Paso City Counsel passing an ordinance to ban smoking in public places such as restaurants and supermarkets. According to the poll, 41 percent oppose such a smoking ban.

El Pasoans also support cutting services rather than paying higher property taxes; 56 percent said they would not favor increased taxes.

On other issues, El Pasoans:

"Oppose the flat tax rate proposed as a measure of tax reform.

"Oppose the Gramm-Rudman budget deficit act. Kaigh was surprised that only 38 percent of El Pasoans favor the Gramm-Rudman act. In a similar poll taken last month of El Paso Democrats only, 37 percent opposed it. Kaigh said he would have expected "to see a 10-point difference" in last week's survey of the general population.

"Support a state lottery by a commanding 69-percent-to-25-percent margin.

"Support horse racing in Texas, 58 percent to 35 percent.

"Support increasing the state sales tax instead of taxing personal income or property.

"Support a law to limit damage awards that a jury can give in a court suit.

"Depend more on television than newspapers as a source of information.

TWO HUNDRED EL PASOANS POLLED ON ISSUE

The K Associates survey on what El Pasoans think on various local, state, national and international issues consisted of 200 registered voters selected at random.

Respondents were chosen from each of the city's 24 precincts in proportion to the populations in each precinct. They were interviewed by telephone March 8-12. The poll has a statistical margin of error of 7 percent. All unsure and other responses have been omitted.

Here are the questions and percentages of answers.

1. A flat federal income tax rate has been proposed as a measure of tax reform. Because many deductions would be eliminated, some people feel this change might not be good for the economy. Do you favor or oppose a flat income tax rate? Favor 33%; Oppose 42%.

2. Although foreign aid helps people in other countries and is important for national security, some people feel that our government should instead use these tax dollars at home in the United States. Do you think that foreign aid to other countries should be reduced? Reduce 72%; Not Reduce 24%.

3. President Reagan has requested $70 million from Congress for military aid to the contras in their effort to replace the Nicaraguan government. Do you agree or disagree with United States' financial support of the contra movement? Agree 36%; Disagree 51%.

4. To balance the budget, the federal government has passed the Gramm-Rudman Act, which will reduce funding for social programs and federal assistance to local government. Based on what you know, do you generally favor or not favor the Gramm-Rudman legislation? Favor 35%; Not Favor 52%.

5. Under current United States law, abortion for any reason is legal. Which of the following is closet to your opinion? Abortion should be legal for any reason. Abortion should be legal only in cases of rape or danger to the mother. All abortion should be illegal. Legal 31%; Legal sometimes 42%; Illegal 20%.

6. Every public school teacher in Texas must take a basic competency exam this spring. The stated purpose is to help improve education, but some people feel that such an exam doesn't measure teaching ability and is a waste of tax dollars.

Do you think that teachers should be required to take this competency exam or not? Yes 63%; No 33%.

Should teachers who fail the exam twice lose their jobs? Yes 41%; No 49%.

7. Lotteries and horse racing have been effective in raising money for other state governments, but some people are morally opposed to such activities in Texas.

Do you favor or oppose a Texas state lottery? Favor 29%; Oppose 25%.

How about horse racing in Texas? Favor 59%; Oppose 35%.

8. Because of declining oil prices, Texas needs more revenue to fund education and other important services. Of the three tax options—increased sales tax, a state personal income tax or a state property tax—which single one would you oppose the most? Income 43%; Sales 10%; Property 43%.

Which single tax would you oppose the least? Income 13%; Sales 63%; Property 11%.

9. Because of the cost of increased insurance coverage, some states now limit damage amounts awarded by juries to injured parties. Do you think Texas should pass a law to limit such jury awards, or would you be opposed? Pass 62%; Oppose 31%.

10. Some people feel that El Paso City Council should pass an ordinance or law to prohibit smoking in public places such as restaurants and supermarkets. Would you favor an anti-smoking ordinance for public places? Favor 56%; Not 41%.

11. Federal assistance to local governments will be cut in the future, and some services might have to be reduced unless taxes are raised. Would you be willing to pay higher property taxes to keep city services at their current level? Yes 39%; No 56%.

12. Which one of the following local news media is your single most important source of news information—newspapers, TV or radio? Papers 39%; TV 53%; Radio 9%.

Which local TV news program do you watch the most: Channel 4, Channel 7 or Channel 9? Channel 4 39%; Channel 7 29%; Channel 9 22%.

REAGAN HAS A TEXAS-SIZED SALES JOB

(By David Maraniss)

HARLINGEN, TEX.—The citizens of Harlingen would like to know what kind of car President Reagan drives. They are also curious as to whether he ever stops to stretch his legs during long trips. And they wonder if perhaps he exceeds the speed limit when he hits the open spaces. Answers to those questions would help them figure out what Reagan meant recently when he declared that Nicaragua was "a privileged sanctuary for terrorists and subversives just two days' drive from Harlingen, Tex."

The driving distance between Harlingen, distribution hub of the Lower Rio Grande Valley, and Managua, capital of Nicaragua, is 2,028 miles. The highways have two lanes and a variety of obstacles: roadside burros, cows, dogs and bicyclists. There are circuitous routes through mountains and tedious stretches across deserts. Choluteca. Tegucigalpa. Guatemala City. El Jocote. Telixtlahuaca. Puebla. Mexico City. Ciudad Victoria. Matamoros. Brownsville. Harlingen. Not an easy trip, as thousands of illegal aliens can attest. Experienced truckers take three to four days. Three days is pushing it.

"You've gotta have it floored the whole way and never stop to make it in two, I would think," said David Allex, president of the Harlingen Chamber of Commerce.

"I looked at the map the other day and shook my head," said Mayor Samuel Lozano. "You have to drive through the mountains of Honduras and Guatemala just to get to Mexico, and then it's 1,200 miles through Mexico. I would say that trip would tax a person."

It has now been almost two weeks since the president placed Harlingen into the realm of geopolitical rhetoric, and people here are still baffled by both his statement and the attention it has received. With a key congressional vote on Nicaragua coming up this week, national columnists and cartoonists have had a fine time playing with the idea of this quiet, unprepossessing city, 18.6 miles from the Mexican border, as a first line of defense against the Sandinistas. The Marine Military Academy and Ghost Squadron of the Confederate Air Force, two local outfits with defense connotations, have gotten more publicity than they have had in years.

But here the whole thing is no big deal.

The local daily newspaper, The Valley Morning Star, has run one line about the episode, and that was in a wire story from Washington. "Why should we make anything of it?" asked Edd Clark, city editor. "It was just another politican running off at the mouth. Personally, I'm more concerned about Republicans and Democrats than I am about Marxist-Leninists. I think the only reason Reagan mentioned us is that Harlingen was the closest place to the border that had enough Republicans to make it worth defending."

Harlingen, though it elects Democrats locally and is 70 percent Hispanic, is Reagan country. The city and Cameron County went for him in 1984, and Harlingen promised enough support in 1980 to bring Reagan down for a compaign stop. It is not by accident that Phil Gramm, the Republican senator from Texas, has his district office here. But when it comes to Central America, specifically whether the United States should send military aid to the rebel contras seeking to overthrow the leftist Nicaraguan government, Harlingen appears to be no different from Congress and the rest of the country: unconvinced.

"I support President Reagan on some things, but I think we're meddling a little too much in the affairs of other countries right now," said Rodric Morrogh, a safety engineer, as he strolled through the Valle Vista Mall. "I understand the danger of communism, but you don't fight it with guns. The Soviet Union can match us dollar for dollar on guns. But they can't compete if we help clothe and feed the poor people."

Seated on a wooden bench inside the mall that day were two retired men who had moved to Harlingen from Chillicothe, Ill., the home district of House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel.

"I don't want the commies creeping up through our back door," Byron Brumhead said. "But I've never really worried about them Nicaraguans coming up here to Harlingen. The problem isn't invasion. They move slowly, the communists. It's a slow buildup, and they're here and you didn't even know it happened."

"I'm kinda for stopping them right there in their country," Homer Gill said, "My wife, she's against it. She thinks her grandchildren will end up in the war."

Down the highway a few miles, at the Harlingen Country Club, home of the Life Begins at Forty golf tournament, retired doctors Robert Stein, formerly of Lincoln, Neb., and O.G. Linimon, formerly of Houston, said they were not especially concerned that Sandinistas might cruise up the Pan American Highway, invade Harlingen and delay their morning tee time.

"You have to understand one thing about us", Linimon said. "We're retired people. We don't concern ourselves with politics anymore. We have nothing to say about Central America one way or another. All we want to do is play golf. I don't think anyone's gonna invade this golf course, at least not in my lifetime."

Lozano, the Democratic mayor, said he appreciates the publicity Reagan has given his city, but he is more concerned about drug trafficking than about possible terrorist attacks. "That's the real problem here now," Lozano said. "The drug smugglers have found this area a little bit unprepared to deal with them."

Silvestre Reyes, chief of the Border Patrol in the Rio Grande Valley, said drugs are moving across the river at an unprecedented rate. In 1985 his agents in this sector made 159 drug seizures worth $6.7 million. So far in 1986 they have made 287 seizures worth $28.8 million. Reyes said his agents arrested more illegal aliens this February than during any month in history. Among the 10,289 illegals arrested last month were 1,100 from Central America. The patrolmen are on the lookout for terrorists, Reyes said. "We have certain profiles to watch for."

At the edge of Harlingen on Highway 77, the route up from Mexico, stands the Texas Tourist Bureau, a gleaming new facility with a reflecting pool, brick courtyard and red-white-and-blue bunting. "Bienvenidos a Texas," reads the sign outside. "The friendship state welcomes visitors to this land of contrast . . . land of cotton fields and citrus groves, mile-high mountains and semitropic valley, rolling sand dunes and booming oil fields. Texas, blend of drawling cowboy and city sophisticate, old world charm and progressive ideas, thrill-packed rodeos and gay fiestas. Descrubra Texas Para Un Mundo de Differencia."

Inside the tourist office, Sam Martinez, the manager, said he has seen Nicaraguans there on occasion. "I would say very seldom do we get them," he said. "They are illegal aliens, mostly. They huddle over there near the drinking fountain and take turns using the facilities."

SUPPORT FOR RISK RETENTION GROWS

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, over the past 3 years, liability insurance premiums have gone through the roof, threatening to hamstring or drive out of business restauranteurs, small businesses, child care providers, corporate directors and officers, nonprofit organizations, local governments, hazardous waste disposers, nurse-midwives, schools, truckers, accountants, physicians, architects, and other professionals.

Some of these business owners and professionals have had their coverage canceled midpolicy, faced quadruple digit increases in premiums, or been subjected to reduced coverage with increased deductibles. Still others have found coverage unavailable at any price.

On March 4, 1986, I introduced the Risk Retention Act Amendments of 1986, H.R. 4301. Furthermore, in my own State of Oregon, I have started a coalition of small business owners, day care providers, social service agencies, truckers, manufacturers, and others dedicated to getting this legislation passed and signed into law before the end of this Congress.

My legislation, H.R. 4301, the companion to S. 2129 introduced by Senator KASTEN, expands the Product Liability Risk Retention Act of 1981 to allow businesses, professionals, associations, State and local governments, and other individuals and organizations to pool resources to purchase general liability coverage.

This measure is not a panacea for the current liability insurance crisis. It does not preempt the need for addressing the long-range issues of regulatory or tort reform.

But in the meantime, business owners and professionals in this country need a way to help themselves.

I think risk retention will help provide that opportunity, and I firmly believe that we must move quickly to pass this measure in order to avert certain doom for many of our business owners and professionals who stand to lose everything before this crisis is over. I'm commending to my colleagues this editorial from Business Insurance, a leading trade publication of the insurance industry.

[From the Business Insurance, Mar. 10, 1986]

SPEEDY ACTION IS CRITICAL

Amendments proposed to broaden the scope of the Risk Retention Act of 1981 should be passed as soon as possible, but at least by summer.

There's no time to waste in providing businesses with new risk funding alternatives.

Under amendments to the act introduced in the Senate on Feb. 28, businesses, certain professionals and municipalities could form purchasing groups to collectively buy insurance or create risk retention groups to collectively self-fund all liability risks except workers compensation (see story, page 1).

Currently, the Risk Retention Act offers the risk retention group risk financing alternative only to product manufacturers, distributors, wholesalers or retailers to cover their product liability risks. The purchasing group option is more widely available, but the purchase of product liability insurance must be one of the group's purposes.

Businesses, unable to purchase affordable commercial liability insurance—and sometimes any insurance at any price—deserve, as soon as possible, the opportunities to solve their insurance problems offered by an expanded Risk Retention Act.

Basically, the act makes it easier for businesses to join together to buy insurance or collectively self-fund their risks by eliminating the problems of satisyfing varying state insurance laws around the country.

We recognize that opening up group insurance purchasing and group self-insurance creates new risks, such as poorly designed group insurance programs and the possibility that some risk retention groups could under-reserve for future losses. However, we believe that businesses in these groups will do a good job of policing their own activities because each will want to be sure that its coverage for losses is sound. Furthermore, we believe that the regulation of these groups in one state, as called for in the act, will suffice to prevent most, if not all, problems.

It's particularly important that Congress act quickly to expand the Risk Retention Act, or else history could repeat itself.

The concept of a risk retention group grew out of studies of the product liability insurance crisis of the mid-1970's. But, it took until the fall of 1979 for the act to be developed, and it took Congress more than two years to pass the Risk Retention Act. By the fall of 1981, when the law was passed, businesses had already suffered through the worst of a tight insurance market and commercial product liability insurance was becoming readily available.

If Congress stalls these amendments for two years, commercial insurers will be well on their way to financial recovery, and we expect the crisis in insurance pricing and availability will be easing. But, for two years, companies will have been damaged by inadequate risk financing programs to the extent that some could be driven out of business or choose to close their doors.

The sooner these amendments are passed, the sooner businesses can develop desperately needed solutions to the grave problems of high-priced insurance and even worse, no insurance.

THANKS TO PIZZA HUT

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend one of the local corporations in my district for its good work in the community. Pizza Hut has promised again this summer to employ over 200 young people in Houston. Pizza Hut will employ these young black people through a new employment program called Job Plus—an employment program that promises to employ Houston's youth in meaningful work experiences.

In light of the serious economic troubles facing my city of Houston, in particular, and the rest of the Nation, Pizza Hut's contributions in combating the rising tide of youth unemployment are even more welcomed and appreciated. Providing young men and women with an opportunity to demonstrate their skills in the workplace, is an invaluable first step in their growth as independent and responsible members of the community.

I hope that other businesses and corporations in Houston and other cities across the country will look to Pizza Hut as a role model and make similar contributions in their communities. Again, I sincerely thank and commend Pizza Hut for their priceless contribution to Houston and its youth.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE LATE EDWARD J. JAMISON

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it has recently been brought to my attention that a leader in our community, Mr. Edward J. Jamison, has passed away. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to Ed.

A native of Ohio, Ed served in the U.S. Navy during World War II and the Korean War. After an honorable discharge from the service, Ed spent the next 25 years as a sheet metal mechanic and was a member of the Sheet Metal Workers Local 420.

Ed Jamison was my opponent in the 1980 Democratic congressional primary and although he and I held slighlty different views on the controversial subject of abortion, I always admired him for his longstanding commitment to the issue. Ed will be remembered for the many contributions he made to the pro-life movement in California. He was past president of the California Pro-Life Council and at different times, was a vice president and treasurer of the council in southern California. He was also the founder of Alliance for Life and the Long Beach Voice for the Unborn. According to his wife, Lupe, at the time of Ed's death, he was working toward getting homes started for women with problem pregnancies. This initiative, which as typical for Ed, is indeed commendable.

In addition to Ed's pro-life activities, he served as extraordinary minister and lecturer at Holy Innocents Catholic Church and was a member of the Holy Name Society and catechism instructor at St. Lucy's Catholic Church.

During his lifetime, Ed contributed a great deal to his country, his State, and certainly to our community, and for that we are indeed grateful. Although he is no longer with us, you can be sure his spirit lives on.

My wife, Lee, joins me in expressing our sincere condolences, to Ed's widow, Lupe, and their children, Mary and Gregory Jamison, Paul Ferrel, Colleen Triesch and Maureen Ferrel, at this time.

CDBG: AN IMPORTANT FEDERAL PROGRAM

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the Community Development Block Grant Program is one of the most important Federal programs. It provides needed sevices for communities, the formula is a progressive one that responds to need, and legislation enacted by Congress requires that the bulk of the funds go for people who are in particular need of services.

Unfortunately, the Reagan administration seems oblivious to the merits of this program and has been whittling away at it. The city of Fall River, which I represent, is an example of an older industrial city fighting hard to regain economic prosperity, and meeting with some success, in part because of its constructive and responsible use of various Federal funding programs. The Community Development Block Grant Program is one of the most useful in the city of Fall River and I have seen first hand the important work that is done there under the leadership of Mayor Viveiros.

Recently, the Fall River Herald News, which does an excellent job of working for economic progress in the city, ran an editorial about the importance of the Community Development Block Grant Program. The editorial is thoughtful and accurate and I include it for your attention.

NEED COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The public hearings of the Community Development Agency were held as usual last week, as they have been annually at this time for the past several years.

This time they were slightly different than usual, however, because many of those speaking in favor of a favorite project also pointed out how much has been done for the city by the Community Development Agency in the past.

The reason for the tributes and the concern is obvious enough. No one knows what lies ahead for the Community Development Agency.

It may very well be one of the casualties of the current drive to reduce the federal deficit.

At the moment the administration has proposed a 30 percent reduction in the Community Development Block Grant program, to become effective July 1.

Whether that reduction will be endorsed by Congress is not yet clear, but it must be said that there has been little disposition on the part of congressional leaders to rally to the defense of programs of this kind.

Urban action groups from all over the country has stressed the importance of Community Development block grants, but without being able to affect the administration's apparent determination to reduce, if not eliminate, them.

Most cities have used the block grants for vital services of all kinds.

If the funding for these services is reduced, that by no means implies that the need for them has declined.

There is no such thing as a decline in the need for street repairs, for instance.

As the Mayors' Association has pointed out; the cities are in no position to pay for necessary repairs themselves.

The chances are that here in Massachusetts, the state government will make up part of the monetary loss from Community Development block grants if the administration's 30 percent cutback goes into effect.

But nobody knows the mechanism by which this would be done, and in any case, the whole elaborate as well as efficient apparatus by which the Community Development Agency arrived at its decisions would be sacrificed.

The proposed reduction in funding is obviously the most serious threat to the agency, but if it becomes necessary for the state to take over some of the funding for this purpose, it should try to maintain the existing mechanism for determining which of many possible projects will be implemented.

The Community Development Agency here in Fall River has an enviable reputation, and the respect of the entire city.

Certainly Fall River hopes that federal plans for cutbacks in the agency's funds will not succeed, but if they do, then it hopes that the state and city governments, working together, will develop some means of maintaining the CDA's present procedures.

Those procedures are fair, efficient and highly productive.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, I would first like to express my heartfelt thanks to my colleagues across the aisle for looking out for us in the minority, and bringing the President's budget to the floor. It was indeed a noble gesture.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but I thought it was the role of Congress, not the President, to put together this country's budget. Is the President's budget not a starting point from which Congress composes its own budget resolution? Or perhaps we should consider all President Reagan's initiatives on the floor. In that case, I look forward to seeing the President's tax reform proposal on the agenda. The American people would be much better off with it than what finally passed the House.

Yes; I voted against the President's budget last Thursday, but not because I didn't agree with the guidelines he set forth. He presented a budget which, until proven to me otherwise, met Gramm-Rudman targets without a tax increase, without cuts in Social Security, without decimating low-income programs and without jeopardizing our national security. Our own Budget Committee would do well to adopt similar goals.

But that's not to say the President's proposal should be adopted as the budget for the United States, I have specific difficulties with his proposal, such as the magnitude of the increase in defense. In a bipartisan fashion, we should iron out these differences and produce a compromise which embodies as many of our individual priorities as possible. And we have to do this by April 15 under Gramm-Rudman.

I trust those across the aisle enjoyed Thursday's session of President bashing. I wonder if we can now get on with the business at hand and produce a budget of our own before the deadline. And let me recommend a responsible effort meeting Gramm-Rudman targets without a tax increase, or I will once again push the nay button.

We've had our fun. But it won't be fun this October explaining to our constituents that because Congress failed to put together a responsible budget they have to suffer through another round of sequestration. The way I see it, not counting recesses, Congress has less than a month to compose and pass the fiscal 1987 budget. I'll believe it when I see it.

Oh, by the way, since House leadership has now started looking out for those on the minority side, how about vote on the balanced-budget amendment, Mr. Speaker? The American people sure would appreciate it.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, as Black History Month 1986 draws to a close, it is most fitting that all Americans, particularly those of us from the South, take a few moments to reflect upon our shared culture and heritage, especially the significant role that blacks have played in the development of the country and the South.

I want to share with Members of the House the fantastic research project going on in my home State of Arkansas. This effort, called "Persistence of the Spirit," reveals for the first time the part played by black Arkansans in the 300 years of the State's history. During the celebration of Arkansas' sesquicentennial year of statehood this special project will include a touring photographic exhibit, accompanying historical pamphlets and free public lectures.

With funding from the Arkansas Endowment for the Humanities, the National Endowment for the Humanities and leading Arkansas corporate citizens, the project is under the direction of Ken Hubbell. Already, "Persistence of the Spirit" has uncovered hundreds of stories which otherwise might never have been widely known. One such story was discovered and written by Tom Dillard, a historian and member of the research team about Mifflin W. Gibbs.

The text of the story follows:

M.W. GIBBS SUCCESSFUL IN MANY CAREERS

When slavery ended after the Civil War, black Arkansans were able to turn their attention to business activity. Most blacks, like most whites, made their living as small farmers or as farm workers. However, a surprising number of blacks were able to enter the business world. Mifflin Wistar Gibbs of Little Rock was one of the more successful.

Born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1823, Gibbs joined the California gold rush in 1850 and he became a successful merchant. Later, he moved to Victoria, Canada, where he ran a large store and helped open a coal mine.

In 1871 Gibbs moved to Little Rock where he soon established himself as a lawyer and politician. In November, 1873, Gibbs was elected Little Rock Police Judge, the first black man to win a city judgeship in American history.

When he was not involved in politics, Gibbs occupied himself with business activity. He was especially interested in buying land and his law firm doubled as a real estate agency. He often urged his fellow blacks to buy land that would bring economic independence.

The years after the Civil War were times of great economic and industrial expansion in America, ranging from railroad construction to the formation of giant insurance companies.

Gibbs invested in a large number of business ventures, ranging from the Arkansas Anthracite Coal Company to the Little Rock electric power plant. In 1903, he organized the Capital City Savings Bank and later the People's Mutual Aid Association, a health insurance company. In 1907 a nationwide economic "panic" occurred and the Gibbs' bank was closed.

Despite the failure of his bank, Gibbs was still a wealthy man. He shared his resources with the less fortunate, including a donation to establish the M.W. Gibbs Old Ladies Home, a rest home for poor elderly black women.

When he died in 1915, Gibbs was mourned by both black and white. He had shown the black Arkansans could play an important role in the business life of our state.

COSTA RICA AND NICARAGUA SIGN BORDER AGREEMENT

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the administration argues that Nicaragua has repeatedly failed to pursue bilateral and multilateral negotiations in order to deal with its neighbors' security concerns. And yet on March 12, the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua signed an agreement establishing a Permanent Commission to investigate border incidents.

This agreement marks a turning point in the search for peace in Central America. Thanks to the efforts of the Contadora and Support Group nations, Nicaragua and Costa Rica have established a viable mechanism to deal with a serious problem, border incidents that have occurred in the past due to the presence of Contra forces on the border.

The Permanent Commission will be composed of representatives of Contadora, the Support Group, and the Central American nations and will be divided into an Executive Commission and an Inspection and Observation Group. Its main function will be to investigate and carry out on-site inspections of incidents that could lead to border tensions.

There are reports in the press that the administration is irritated at Costa Rica for pursuing this agreement with the Nicaraguans because the agreement contradicts the administration's statements that Nicaragua is not sincere about negotiations.

But this agreement demonstrates what we have said all along: Negotiations are a viable alternative to the administration's military approach. If the administration were serious about its statements in support of Contadora, it would withdraw its Contra request and would respond positively to the request for material and financial support contained in the agreement. Peace is possible in Central America. Let's vote no on aid to the Contras.

A copy of the agreement follows:

TEXT OF THE AGREEMENT SIGNED BY COSTA RICA AND NICARAGUA

In an effort to create a climate of trust and security in the border region that will be compatible with the peace initiative of the Contadora Group, the Deputy Foreign Ministers of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, in the name of their respective governments, have decided to formulate with the utmost urgency an agreement that will establish a Permanent Commission for the investigation and inspection of border incidents, based on the following understandings:

(I) TYPE

(1) It is a permanent civil mission that will have the help of technically qualified defense and security advisers.

(II) FUNCTIONS

(1) Observation, investigation and on-site inspection of those incidents or activities that could lead to tensions in the border region.

(2) Preparation of reports and recommendations to the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, as well as the member countries of the Commission.

(III) COMMITMENT OF THE PARTIES TO THE AGREEMENT

(1) The Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua pledge themselves to implement the recommendations made to them, or to take the necessary measures that will allow the clarification of the situations that motivated the investigation.

(IV) STRUCTURE AND MEMBERSHIP

(1) An Executive Commission composed of civilian representatives from the participating countries (Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Contadora Group and the Support Group). This Commission will be the Executive Organ and will function with rotating coordination provided by the Contadora Group and the Support Group.

(2) An Inspection and Observation Group composed of defense and security advisers from the Contadora countries and the Support Group, to be based on both sides of the border.

(V) SECURITY OF THE COMMISSION

(1) The Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua will provide all available means to guarantee the integrity and security of the Commission.

(VI) SUPPLIES AND FINANCING

(1) Contributions from the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua in their respective countries. The Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua commit themselves to provide lodging, food, sanitation and offices with secretarial staff and office equipment. The supply of fuel is yet to be decided. Similarly, these same parties will facilitate the use by the members of the Commission of their communication systems in those cases where circumstances allow it and if the capabilities of the host country makes it possible.

(2) To carry out the aforementioned objectives of the Commission, both parties agree to make the necessary financial arrangements to achieve the stated goals.

(3) Contributions from the Governments of the Contadora Group, the Support Group and other countries.

The Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua expressed the need to make the Commission viable by supplying it with air transportation, river boats, light weight vehicles and communication equipment, as well as the necessary crew, mechanics, operators and spare parts for the vehicles. In this respect, both countries request that the Contadora Group and the Support Group seek the assistance of the international community to obtain the material and financial support needed for the Mission.

(VII) IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES

In order to guarantee the carrying out of the Commission's work and the safety of its personnel, questions relating to immunity, privileges and facilities will be defined in a separate agreement between the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua and the Governments of the countries participating in the Commission.

Until such an agreement is reached, both parties agree to extend the same privileges and immunities of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations to the members of the Commission, if they are attached to the respective diplomatic missions, based in one of the two countries.

(VIII)

Matters pertaining to insurance and civil responsibilities will be addressed later in the agreement.

(IX)

Within the framework of these negotiations, the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua requested of the representatives of the Contadora countries and the Support Group that, with the participation of representatives of the two countries, a general reconnaissance of the zone along the common border be carried out as soon as possible.

In order to carry out this reconnaissance, both governments will make available the resources and facilities at their disposal.

The agreement to be signed will be in effect for one year. It will be automatically renewable for periods of one year. After the first year, either of the parties may renounce it, provided it states its intentions in writing to the other party six months prior to the renewal date, and notifies the participating countries.

Done in San Jose, Costa Rica, on this 12th day of March, nineteenth hundred and eighty-six.

GERARDO TREJOS,
for Costa Rica.
VICTOR HUGO TINOCO,
for Nicaragua.

TELEPHONE DECENCY ACT OF 1986

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am joined today by over 30 of my colleagues in introducing the Telephone Decency Act of 1986. The purpose of this bill is to amend section 223 of the Communications Act of 1934 to prohibit obscene and indecent communications for commercial purposes by means of telephone to any person, regardless of age. This amendment is necessary as the history of this legislation will show.

The original section 223, as passed in 1968, prohibited obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, and indecent communications by means of telephone. The law did not state that the maker of the comment must also be the maker of the call, so the service dial-a-porn, in which a caller accesses by phone a tape-recorded message of an obscene nature, was clearly covered by the language of the statute. However, because dial-it services did not exist when the law was passed, the FCC claimed uncertainty concerning its ability to act.

In September 1983, I proposed an amendment to the FCC reauthorization legislation which would have clarified the law by stating that the pornographic communications were prohibited regardless of who placed the call.

However, on the last day of the legislative session of the House in 1983, November 18, an agreement was reached on the House floor to replace the text of this amendment with that which we have in the law today. Members of the Judiciary Committee made it quite clear that they would demand a sequential referral to their committee if their language was not accepted. The substitute permitted obscene and indecent communications to adults but not to children. It also required the FCC to promulgate regulations describing methods by which dial-a-porn providers could screen out underage callers, and specified that compliance with such regulations constituted "a defense to a prosecution." The President signed this legislation into law on December 8, 1983.

The FCC has twice attempted to satisfy the requirement of the 1983 amendment which instructed it to formulate procedures which would prevent children from gaining access to dial-a-porn with the slightest inconvenience to adults. The first set of regulations, which placed time-of-day restrictions on dial-a-porn, were set aside by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. On October 16, 1985, the FCC released new regulations requiring an authorized access or identification code or payment by credit card. Carlin Communications, Inc. has challenged these regulations, and the Second Circuit Court held a hearing on this on December 19, 1985. The regulations were scheduled to go into effect on November 25, 1985, but the FCC issued a stay pending court review. The new date on which they were scheduled to take effect was December 26, but on December 20 the court took its only action to date in the case by issuing another stay pending its decision.

In the 27 months during which dial-a-porn has been technically illegal, these services have spread from New York to many other major cities around the United States. Four of the seven major telephone companies carry this dial-it service and it is being considered by a fifth. Just last week a representative from Pacific Telesis testified at a Telecommunications Subcommittee hearing that the company was forced to carry these "adult entertainment" services.

The amendment my colleagues and I are introducing today will stop this abuse of telephone communication once and for all. The changes we are suggesting are simple and take into consideration Supreme Court decisions with regard to obscene and indecent speech. In fact, we are doing nothing beyond restoring the original intent of my 1983 amendment which, you will remember, was a clarification of the law. It was not until 1983 that obscene and indecent communications over the phone became legal. Our purpose is to restore, not change. Parents around the country are crying for us to rectify the situation.

This amendment is constitutional. We have many court decisions stating clearly and confidently that obscenity is not protected by the Constitution. To quote Roth versus United States, "We hold that obscenity is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech." Though in Stanley versus Georgia the Court ruled that adults may possess obscene material in their homes, the Justices ruled in United States versus Orito that this does not create a correlative right to receive it, transport it, or distribute it.

One of the objections to my original 1983 amendment was that it did not take into account the Supreme Court's decision in Butler versus Michigan which stated that a "harmful to minors" standard cannot be applied to adults and children alike, because then it would reduce the adult population to hearing only what is fit for children. This is a misinterpretation of Butler. That case applies where the distributor of indecent material can differentiate between adults and children. This cannot be done when the child calls a tape-recorded message. The ruling that better applies is FCC versus Pacifica Foundation. Telephone is more like radio and television because it is easily accessible to children and it is almost impossible for parents to monitor its use.

The FCC versus Pacifica ruling stated:

We held in Ginsberg v New York . . . that the government's interest in the "well-being of its youth" and in supporting "parents' claim to authority in their own household" justified the regulation of otherwise protected expression . . . The ease with which children may obtain access to broadcast material, coupled with the concerns recognized in Ginsberg, amply justify special treatment of indecent broadcasting.

The FCC ruling was restricted to radio and TV, but the reasoning applied to these could easily apply to telephone. Telephones are in most every home and the communications are easily accessible to children.

I would like to make one final point to emphasize the need for this legislation.

Aside from the addictive effect of this obscene material on children, and I have testimony on this from a psychologist who has studied the effects of dial-a-porn specifically, it concerns me that many of these children may believe that the person they hear is something to be imitated. It is not unreasonable to assume that a 12-year-old girl will listen and think to herself, "Is this what is expected of me? Is this how I'm supposed to act?" Or perhaps a teenage boy is listening. Might he not think, "This is how girls should act, and this is the way they want me to respond." Remember, now, we are talking about acts of sodomy and all the violence which accompanies these acts. How can these children grow up with a proper notion of sexual intercourse, that is the union of a man and woman who already share a mutual feeling of respect and love, when they hear the moans and guttural sighs of a woman in pain?

Think again of a child of 8 or 9 who is not even old enough to have normal sexual desires. This may be his or her first impression. How many of us, to this day, remember some shocking or influential event from our childhood which instantly made an impression on us and formed an opinion, inclination, or revulsion in us?

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are dead serious about this bill. We firmly believe it is vitally necessary for our children, and that the present situation is a scandal to our country and a slap in the face of our Founding Fathers.

MARKET ACCESS BARRIERS TO UNITED STATES SODA ASH EXPORTS TO JAPAN, KOREA, AND TAIWAN

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Ways and Means Committee which has jurisdiction over trade legislation, I have been staunchly opposed to protectionist legislation. Such measures have an awesome potential to wreck havoc with the American economy in particular the already hard-hit American farmer. Simply put, arbitrarily closing our markets to foreign goods means their markets will be closed to ours and sectors like agriculture will again take one on the chin.

Free trade is, however, a two way street. Where unfair trade barriers exist to our exports, we are obliged to work to remove them. This is the case with American soda ash exports to Pacific rim countries, especially Japan.

For some time now I have been watching the case of the soda ash industry that has great potential for generating new exports and creating new jobs in America's heartland. It is an export industry that will grow 9 percent this year in spite of a strong dollar and one that is responsible for over 20,000 U.S. jobs. However, it is an industry that is being denied fair access to countries that maintain major trade surpluses with the United States.

Soda ash is the basic raw material for glass. The United States is fortunate in having a unique deposit of the mineral used to manufacture soda ash, in fact enough to supply world demand for over 1,300 years. We can produce soda ash at a cost much less than any competitor in the world because we use half the energy and 60 percent of the manpower required by plants elsewhere. Where the United States has fair access we've captured better than 50 percent of the domestic market.

But in high-consumption countries like Japan, and fast growing markets such as Korea and Taiwan, United States market share is much smaller than it should be due to unfair import barriers.

Japan is the most blatant example of fairness. There, United States soda ash is so clearly barred from competition that the Japan Fair Trade Commission itself ruled in 1983 that domestic soda ash producers and distributors had violated Japan's antimonopoly laws on numerous counts. Despite these findings, little or no actions have been taken by that Government to end the anticompetitive practices. The result continues to be loss of U.S. sales and new job opportunities.

United States soda ash exports are very competitive with Japanese production. In fact, 78 percent of soda ash production in Japan has a cash cost in excess of the landed cash costs of American soda ash imports. Despite our tremendous cost and quality advantages the United States has less than 20 percent of Japan's market.

Were Japan to enforce its anticompetitive ruling of 1983, United States exports would grow significantly. New exports of soda ash would translate into 500 to 700 new jobs for the U.S. producers and shippers of soda ash. These jobs would be created chiefly in Nebraska and Wyoming where the Union Pacific Railroad System is closely involved with moving soda ash exports to west coast ports.

Recently, I requested that the Japanese Embassy ask for a Japanese Government evaluation of import barriers to our soda ash exports. They have undertaken this evaluation and I will be letting the House know of the results of review. The administration has also been raising this issue with the Japanese.

Whereas Japan's unfair barriers are the most egregious, Korea and Taiwan also impose tariff and nontariff barriers to protect inefficient and outdated soda ash producers. Both countries have exceedingly high tariffs for a basic industrial commodity in addition to maintaining government-sanctioned import barriers that prevent U.S. exporters from capturing a fair share of their markets.

Soda ash is an American success story. We have the world's largest natural mineral reserves and the world's most efficient production methods. It is a prime example of America's natural resource capability being exported with a state-of-the-art technology. United States sales and jobs should not be denied because Japan refuses to enforce its own antimonopoly laws and because Korea and Taiwan protect inefficient producers through unfair import barriers. I will continue to urge our trade negotiators and representatives of those governments to address these issues so that a fair solution can be achieved soon.

THE GLOCK 17

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I urge you to join me and Representative TED WEISS in supporting our crucial amendment to prevent a deadly new generation of plastic firearms from gaining a foothold in the United States. These yet-to-be-marketed firearms are invisible to x-ray machines and metal detectors, and are custom-made for terrorists.

Several weeks ago, the Glock 17, an Austrian handgun made partly out of plastic, made its first appearance in United States markets. Clearly, it is only the first of what will soon be far more sophisticated plastic weapons. The president of the National Association of Federally Licensed Firearms Dealers recently predicted that a 100-percent plastic gun will soon be manufactured domestically.

This prediction cannot be ignored. Unless Congress takes action, these undetectable plastic weapons may soon render the security measures of every airport in the country obsolete. My amendment aims to prevent plastic guns from becoming a security threat.

The amendment, which exempts military and law-enforcement personnel, would not affect any firearm currently manufactured in the United States, nor would it affect the vast majority of imported guns. Instead, it would prohibit the domestic manufacture of new firearms and the importation of any firearm that the Secretary of the Treasury determines is not detectable by standard airport security equipment.

We must act now to prevent these deadly weapons from ever becoming a security threat. Please join me in voting for this vital amendment to keep invisible plastic guns out of terrorist hands.

The amendment follows:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 4332, AS REPORTED, OFFERED BY MR. MRAZEK OF NEW YORK

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

SEC. 16. PROHIBITIONS WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN FIREARMS.

(a) MANUFACTURE.—(1) Section 922 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the subsection added by section 2 the following:

"(o) Except as provided in section 925(f) of this title, it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture any firearm that the Secretary determines is not—

"(1) readily detectable as a firearm by the standard security equipment commonly used at airports; and

"(2) readily identifiable as a firearm.".

(2) Section 925 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(f) The Secretary shall declare an exemption from the prohibition of section 922(o) of this title with respect to firearms of a type determined by the Secretary to be identical to a type designed and produced in the United States for commercial sale before January 1, 1986.".

(b) IMPORTATION.—Section 925(d) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end the following: "The Secretary shall not authorize under this subsection the importation of any firearm that is not readily detectable as a firearm by the standard security equipment commonly used at airports and readily identifiable as a firearm.".

THE UNITED STATES STANDS ISOLATED ON CONTRA AID

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the debate on House Joint Resolution 540, I think it is important for this Congress to recognize what is now obvious: None of our democratic allies in this hemisphere or around the world supports our policy of aid to the Contras.

According to a recent story that appeared in the Washington Post:

The diplomatic mood in Latin America has tipped against Washington in recent months, weakening the Reagan Administration's sales pitch to Congress for aid to the Nicaraguan rebels and isolating the United States in the region on the issue.

In his article, Robert McCartney quotes senior diplomats from Latin America and other Western countries as saying that: "Such U.S. involvement only aggravates the conflict in Central America and hurts chances for a negotiated settlement there." In an article that appeared in the Baltimore Sun on March 7, 1986, Augusto Ramirez Ocampo, the foreign minister of Colombia, is quoted as saying that the U.S. position is "intransigent and extreme," and that "as long as the United States is asking for aid for the Contras, there is not a political climate for national reconciliation."

Mr. Speaker, why is this administration so unresponsive to the appeals of our Latin American neighbors and allies? It is laughable that in response to this overwhelming condemnation of our policy, the administration claims that privately Latin American countries have expressed support for our policies. According to a March 7 Baltimore Sun article, Secretary Shultz was asked three times by Senator CHRISTOPHER DODD, during a hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee 2 weeks ago, to name a single country that supports the administration's policy. Mr. Shultz said that some are supporting it but was unable to give any examples. Furthermore, Mr. McCartney quotes a South American envoy as saying: "It is unrealistic for the United States to say that all of our diplomatic work is just for show. This attitude leads nowhere." A western ambassador added: "The Americans claim to hear privately all the time that people wish they would go in against the Sandinistas. This is just not what we are being told by the Latin Americans."

One of the reasons these nations oppose our policy is that they do not view the Contras as a viable force but as an undemocratic force interested in returning to the pre-1979 past. Jorge Castaneda, a senior associate with the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, pointed out in the Los Angeles Times last week that: "No Latin American government has extended the Contras recognition of any sort, despite recent precedents: The Andean Group of Nations recognized the Sandinistas as a 'belligerent force' in 1979, and the French-Mexican declaration of 1981 recognized the Salvadoran insurgents as 'a representative political force'."

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time in the history of our relations with Latin America that we have had eight foreigners come to Washington to plead with the administration to stop its military intervention in Central America. It is obvious that the administration has chosen to ignore this plea. It is up to the Congress now to respond in a responsible manner to our friends and allies. Let's vote no on aid to the Contras.

I would like to share with my colleagues these three articles.

LATIN MOOD SHIFTS AGAINST WASHINGTON

DIPLOMATIC TREND WEAKENS REAGAN EFFORT TO ISOLATE NICARAGUA AND WIN CONTRA AID

(By Robert J. McCartney)

MEXICO CITY, March 16—The diplomatic mood in Latin America has tipped against Washington in recent months, weakening the Reagan administration's sales pitch to Congress for aid to the Nicaraguan rebels and isolating the United States in the region on the issue.

Seven South American countries and Mexico, grouped in the Contadora movement, took, the unprecedented step last month of formally urging the U.S. government to halt aid to the guerrillas and press efforts for a regional peace treaty.

These countries are convinced that such U.S. involvement only aggravates the conflict in Central America and hurts chances for a negotiated settlement there, according to senior diplomats of Latin American and other western countries.

The Latin Americans' stepped-up role has its roots in the expansion of the Contadora movement last summer, in the emergence of new democratic governments in South America, and in a new sense of regional solidarity owing to the Latin American debt crisis, diplomats said.

In Central America, a center-left tide in recent election has contributed to fresh interest in peace talks with Nicaragua's Sandinista government.

Costa Rica has irritated the United States by talking directly with Nicaragua about the two nations' border problems. Guatemala's new civilian government, hoping to make a foreign policy splash, plans to host a summit of Central America's five presidents in May.

The diplomatic trend appears to have undermined Washington's efforts to isolate Nicaragua. Instead, the United States finds itself isolated in the face of nearly unanimous regional opposition to helping the contras, or counterrevolutionaries, who are fighting a civil war against the Sandinista government.

"The United States' support efforts [for the contras] lead to concern that it could be the cause of destabilization and greater conflict in Central America. There is real ideological agreement on this among the countries in the Contadora groups," South American ambassador said.

The Latin Americans' shift has attracted the attention of U.S. allies in Western Europe, Canada and Australia and reinforced the allies own skepticism over U.S. policy in Central America, western diplomats said.

Nevertheless, the tilt is unlikely to have much effect beyond its impact on U.S. and foreign public opinion. None of the Contadora countries has expressed any intention to cut back economic or diplomatic ties with the United States because of disagreements over Central America.

Moreover, Washington may benefit later this year from the Latin American counties' own growing frustration with the Nicaraguan government's military buildup and curbs on political pluralism, according to the Latin and other western diplomats. These sources emphasize, however, that dissatisfaction with the Sandinistas did not translate into support for the contras.

To some extent, the Latin Americans are making a fuss over contra aid in order to underline their opposition to direct U.S. military action in the region, western diplomats and other observers said. Several Latin American goverments worry that use of U.S. forces against Nicaragua would trigger large protest demonstrations and cause significant political unrest in their countries, the sources said.

Peruvian President Alan Garcia said Friday that his country would break diplomatic relations with the United States if it attacked Nicaragua.

"The Latins are saying very strongly that the time has come to tell the United States that you can't just send the Marines into Latin America anymore," a senior West European diplomat said.

As far as contra aid is concerned, U.S. officials argue that the Latin Americans' diplomatic stance is largely a public relations gimmick playing on anti-Yankee feeling at home.

"Central America is a long way away from some of these [Contadora] countries and is not a priority national interest," a U.S. official said.

Some U.S. officials say that representatives of several Latin American nations have told the United State privately that their governments "secretly" favor a tough line against Nicaragua, and even want Washington to back the contras. This was disputed strongly, however, in interviews with senior diplomats of four Latin American countries and three non-Latin U.S. allies.

"It is unrealistic for the United States to say that all of our diplomatic work is just for show. This attitude leads nowhere," a South American envoy said.

A western ambassador said: "The Americans claim to hear privately all the time that people wish they would go in against the Sandinistas. That is just not what we are being told by the Latin Americans."

A high point of Latin American opposition to U.S. policy in Central America came on Feb. 10, when the foreign ministers of the eight countries of the Contadora movement met jointly with Secretary of State George P. Shultz in Washington to urge the United States to halt aid to the contras.

The original Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama—has been trying since January 1983 to draw up a region-wide peace treaty for Central America. The group, named for the Panamanian island where it first met, has produced two major draft treaties calling for Central America's countries to reduce their military arsenals, halt all support for guerrillas in neighboring countries, and promote democracy at home.

Neither pact has won universal acceptance among the five Central American nations: Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Critics charge that the Contadora process has yielded only meaningless paperwork and fruitless diplomatic conferences.

But the Contadora process got a boost last July when Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Peru formed a support group for Contadora. The Contadora movement now includes every major Latin American democracy except Bolivia, Ecuador and the Dominican Republic, and represents approximately 300 million people.

Three of the support group countries—Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina—have switched recently from military to civilian governments, which the U.S. administration applauded.

In general, however, the new democratic governments are pursuing policies that are more nationalistic and more critical of Washington.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Mar. 10, 1986]

LATIN AMERICANS DO NOT BACK CONTRA AID

(By Jorge G. Castaneda)

The debate on U.S. aid to the contras in Nicaragua clearly has more to do with the political winds in the United States than in Central America. Likewise, whatever decision Congress reaches on President Reagan's request for $100 million in military and "non-lethal" aid, its deliberations will not be greatly influenced by other nations' views.

Thus it is surprising to hear Administration spokesmen referring to Latin American support for such aid—particularly since there is no such support in Latin America, as the Administration knows.

Indeed, no Latin American leader not directly involved in the Central American conflict has been willing to publicly support Reagan on this issue. Even leaders in the area, such as newly elected President Oscar Arias of Costa Rica, have unequivocally stated their opposition. Nor has any Latin American head of state or foreign minister been willing to meet publicly—and few privately—with contra military leaders, although political figures like Arturo Cruz have been received by South American leaders such as President Belisario Betancur of Colombia.

No Latin American government has extended the contras recognition of any sort, despite recent precedents: The Andean Group of Nations recognized the Sandinistas as a "belligerent force" in 1979, and the French-Mexican declaration of 1981 recognized the Salvadoran insurgents as "a representative political force." Other than Honduras, the last Latin government to support the contras was the Argentine military in 1982—the government that brought us the Malvinas adventure, and thousands of missing, dead and tortured during the "Dirty War" from 1976 to 1982.

But Latin America's views on aid to the contras are not only implicit or passive. In January the foreign ministers of the Contadora Group—Colombia, Panama, Mexico and Venezuela—and those of the Contadora Support Groups—Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uruguay (the "new democracies")—met in Caraballeda, Venezuela. They reaffirmed their support for the Contadora process, but, more important, they specifically called for new, unconditional talks between the United States and the government of Nicaragua.

When the foreign ministers met with Secretary of State George P. Shultz last month, their message was clear: Latin America is firmly opposed to continuing U.S. aid to the contras, and considers it a major obstacle to peace in Central America. Any discrepancies between their public and private statements can be attributed to traditional Latin discretion; they did not want to underline U.S.-Latin disagreements, but simply to state them unambiguously.

In fact, one might have expected that, given the economic difficulties of the "Caraballeda 8," they would no longer state their views on the Central American crisis at all, much less with such vigor. Peru, which has practically suspended payments on its foreign debt and is facing a complete credit cutoff, is a case in point. Another, perhaps more relevant one, is Mexico.

With the price of oil below $15 a barrel, little or no sympathy in Washington or on Wall Street for its new predicament, and faced with large debt-service payments on March 31 that it cannot, should not and quite possibly will not meet. Mexico could easily have remained silent on the issue of aid to the contras. It has muted many of its other past criticisms of U.S.-Central American policy, and certainly has cut back on its previous support to the Sandinistas. But the contras are another matter—for Mexico and for the rest of Latin America.

The reason is simple. Since independence in the 19th Century, Latin American nations have been meddling in each other's affairs. But the also have denounced American (and previously French and British) intervention. A double standard? U.S. power, wealth and influence are in a different league with local conspiracies, guerrillas and coups d'etats. What is tolerated among weak Latin nations (except for those directly affected) is not welcome when issued by the overwhelming power to the north.

No Latin government can afford to legitimize a U.S. policy based on encouraging and arming a local opposition. In Latin America's perception, U.S. administrations change—and change their minds—too often. Yesterday's friend is today's problem and tomorrow's enemy. Most Latin leaders know that they would be hard-pressed to withstand a U.S.-sponsored domestic military attempt to unseat them. Every Latin leader understands that this is Reagan's goal with the Sandinistas. Few in Latin America may like the Sandinistas, but fewer still would want to one day find themselves in the same shoes.

Latin American opposition to aid for the contras is strictly a matter of self-interest. While the leaders' objections may not have been expressed as clearly as they could be, they are still very real. And Congress should have no doubt about it.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Mar. 7, 1986]

LATIN NATIONS UNITED AGAINST U.S. AID TO "CONTRAS"

WASHINGTON.—The Reagan administration's most difficult hurdle in convincing Congress to approve $100 million for the "contra" guerrillas in Nicaragua has been explaining why nearly all Latin American countries, including Nicaragua's closest neighbors, express opposition to aiding the rebels.

Assertions that some Latin American leaders privately favor aid, but won't speak out publicly for fear of provoking a leftist outcry at home, have been greeted with skepticism by Democrats and Republicans alike in this country.

The question has come up repeatedly in all of the hearings where administration witnesses have testified on President Reagan's proposal for $30 million in humanitarian aid and $70 million for military aid.

Eight Latin American foreign ministers—from Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uruguay—met with Secretary of State George P. Shultz on Feb. 10 to urge the United States to stop supporting the contras and to focus on diplomatic solutions, such as the four-nation Contadora initiative.

When Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams told a House subcommittee this week that "some of them who say one thing publicly, say another thing privately," Representative Peter Kostmayer, D-Pa., an opponent of contra aid, said that was "a new version of double-speak."

"You're saying they went to all that trouble to send their foreign ministers here—a highly unusual action—[to say] something totally counter to their private view, and that they are cheering us on?" Mr. Kostmayer asked.

After Mr. Abrams made the same argument to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., said it was "immaterial" whether Latin American leaders have different private views, since Congress won't know about them. "We have to go by what they say publicly, on-the-record," Senator Pell said.

The issue has harmed the administration's case which rests largely on the argument that Nicaragua is a threat to its neighbors and that only military pressure through the contras will force the Sandinistas into negotiatons to curb that threat.

Mr. Reagan said this week that if aid to the contras is defeated, the "small and fragile democracies" of Central America would be in danger.

But the newly elected leaders of both Costa Rica and Guatemala have spoken against contra aid. Even Jose Napoleon Duarte, the president of El Salvador, where a leftist-backed insurgency rages that Washington says receives arms from Nicaragua, won't say whether he supports it.

The government of Honduras, where most of the contras have been based, has blocked American humanitarian aid to the contras of nearly six months.

Costa Rica, said by Washington to be the victim of Nicaraguan cross-border subversion, has recently concluded a Contadora-sponsored agreement with the Sandinista government for an international border-observation team.

Oscar Arias Sanchez, the president-elect, has said he agrees with the Reagan administration that the Sandinistas have betrayed their promises and "built a second Cuba." But he said American aid to the contras "won't get what Mr. Reagan wants. On the contrary, they are giving an excuse to the Sandinistas to become more dictatorial, more totalitarian. . . ."

Augusto Ramirez Ocampo, the foreign minister of Colombia, another country Washington says is a target for Nicaraguan-backed terrorism, said after meeting with Mr. Shultz that the U.S. position is "intransigent and extreme," and that "as long as the United States is asking for aid for the contras, there is not a political climate for national reconciliation."

Mr. Shultz was asked three times by Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week, to name a single country that supports the American policy. Mr. Shultz limited his replies to saying "some are" supporting it, but he wouldn't name any."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, D-Mass., said Wednesday, "I haven't met a world leader who agrees with American policy."

SENATE—Tuesday, March 19, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, March 18, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of love and mercy, Who calls Your people to remember Your mighty acts of providence, we thank You for memories. Today we are especially grateful for the initiative taken by Senator DOLE and Senator BYRD to memorialize the seven astronauts who lost their lives in the Challenger disaster. Thank You, Father, for leaders who do not forget to remember, with compassion and gratitude, great Americans whose sacrifices are a milestone in human progress.

We remember, loving Father, the families of those seven heroes, for whom the tragedy is still very real. Comfort them in their immeasurable loss and pain; let them be assured that they are not forgotten by a sorrowing and grateful Nation.

And Father God, while we are remembering, we pray for the hostages who remain in captivity in Lebanon. Help us not to forget them and their families, who bear the unrelieved burden of uncertainty, who keep hoping as they resist despair. Energize those who seek release of the captives, guide them in their persistence, and grant success to their efforts. In the name of Him who came to set the captives free. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the majority leader and the minority leader have 10 minutes each. I will reserve any time I do not use. I also will yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

There will be special orders in favor of Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, SPECTER, ZORINSKY, and perhaps Senator ROTH, for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

Then there will be routine morning business, not to extend beyond 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

At the conclusion of morning business, we hope the Senate can turn to any legislative or executive items which can be cleared.

It is my understanding that there is a debt collection bill that is not controversial—just a matter of bringing it up, as I understand, and getting a rollcall vote. We would like to dispose of that this morning. It is S. 209. I do not know of any request for extended debate on that matter. There will be 10 minutes time for debate.

If we can clear that on each side, maybe we can do it this morning.

Following that, there are a number of options. There is a drug export bill. There is a sports franchise bill. There is a trade bill. There is a regional airport compact. So we have a number of items we could turn to.

It is also my hope that the Senate Budget Committee, which is meeting at this moment, can report a budget resolution, so that we can commence action on that before the Easter recess. We may not complete action.

Then, of course, we still have the Contra aid proposal. Notwithstanding what may happen in the House the proposal will be before the Senate. So far as this Senator knows, it will not be a compromise. It will be as is, as the President requested, and we will vote on that, we hope, Tuesday of next week, though that is flexible.

So we will have a busy schedule between now and the close of business on Thursday, March 27. Then we will commence the Easter recess, we are scheduled to be back in session on Tuesday, April 8.

I hope we may have the cooperation, as we always have—or nearly always have—of my colleagues, so that we can move a number of bills and be in fair shape when we return.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, just very briefly and for the purpose of looking at the schedule between now and the Easter recess, I simply note that there is substantial concern on the part of some Senators about the sports bill that was mentioned. It could require extended debate that might take some time. I only mention that for the majority leader's consideration.

Mr. DOLE. I understand that if we bring it up, there could be extended debate, and that is true of the other matters I mentioned. So it is a question of where we go and where we believe we can make the most progress. I think that sooner or later, probably later, we will have the sports franchise bill up, notwithstanding that it may take some time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, can the majority leader tell us at this time what the likelihood is for, say, rollcall votes beyond 6 o'clock today, whether or not he is able to tell us what the program might be for Friday of this week, and whether or not there will likely be rollcall votes on Friday?

Mr. DOLE. I am not certain about today. There may not be votes after 6, but there could be votes on Friday. I will be in a better position to advise the distinguished minority leader by 1 or 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. BYRD. Very well.

Mr. DOLE. There may be extended debate on whatever we bring up, so there could be debate into the evening, but I doubt that there would be any rollcall votes. I hope to firm that up. It appears that on Friday there could even be a cloture vote on whatever we bring up.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, after the distinguished minority leader has used his time, I yield 3 minutes of my time to the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the balance of my time for the remainder of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR ROTH

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] is recognized.

THE ROTH REFORMS

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, as the issue of tax reform begins to occupy more and more of our time and involvement, I believe it is necessary to keep in mind what the reform package we adopt must do.

Our Nation presently stands on the threshold of a new beginning. Under the leadership of President Reagan we have witnessed a great comeback from the days of stagnant growth and high inflation. And the future beckons.

Today's revolution in science and technology promises that the future will be bright, and we have every reason to be positive. But we will not automatically be the dominant nation in the world economy. We will not remain No. 1 unless we take the necessary steps now to prepare for the changing world economy. One of these steps must be to meet the challenges posed by the stiff competition from abroad.

Whether we are talking about Japan or the rim of Asia, these countries have demonstrated a competence in this new world or high technology. They are able to maintain the most modern industries, the most sophisticated facilities, and the most advanced trade practices. They have large pools of revenue from the savings of their people which in turn provide money for business growth and industry expansion. These savings result from incentives, and they allow these countries to buy our technology, in many cases improve upon it, and beat us in our game.

One only has to look around to see examples of American industries, once thought to be invincible, now scrambling to keep up with the latest advancements made overseas.

As we move forward with tax reform, we should look for policies that will improve the economic and competitive posture of our industries and allow America to maintain its competitive edge. With this in mind, I see four specific goals that we must meet as we put earnest reform into motion:

First, we must continue to ease the tax burden carried by middle America;

Second, we must remove the bias against savings that is presently part of our Tax Code;

Third, our reform package must help American industry modernize and become the most effective and the most efficient in the world, and this modernization must spill over into industries basic to America's role as the shield of the free world; and Fourth, we must lift the bias against American exports and encourage a more level playing field in the arena of trade.

Mr. President, it is my intention to introduce a series of reforms that will allow us to maintain and even strengthen our competitive edge. In short, these reforms will enable us to meet the challenges posed by the foreign competition.

They will meet each of the four criteria listed above, and they will provide for long-range strength, stability, and security in our domestic economy, foreign trade, and international defense.

First, I propose that we reduce the marginal rate of income taxes for individuals to 15, 20, 25, and 30 percent. This will give the typical middle class American an average reduction of at least 8 percentage points in the marginal rate of taxation. The full deduction for State and local taxes will be retained, and the top capital gains rule will be 20 percent.

Second, my reforms will promote savings through tax-deferred super savings accounts [SUSA's]. Similar to IRA's, these SUSA's will allow an individual to save up to $3,000 tax free—$6,000 for families. But, unlike the money locked-in in individual retirement accounts, the money in these SUSA's could be withdrawn at any time, for any purpose, and without penalty. And only upon withdrawal will the money be taxed. In the area of IRA's, I propose an increase in savings potential for housewives, or househusbands, from $250 to $2,000. And I will also retain the current law for 401(k) pension plans.

Third, my reforms will encourage industry growth and modernization through an expense cost recovery system that will allow firms to expense half their equipment costs the first year and depreciate the remainder according to President Reagan's capital cost recovery system. My proposal will also reduce the top corporate Federal tax rate to 33 percent—13 percentage points lower than current law and 3 percentage points lower than the House provision.

This third step will also lend to our goal of modernizing our basic industries important to our security. If we are to be the No. 1 industrial nation in the world, and if we are to continue in our role as the shield for the free world, we must have the most up-to-date industrial facilities. And need I say that these improvements will translate into jobs, a very important factor in our future that must be considered today.

Fourth, my reforms will level the playing field of international trade through the introduction of a business transfer tax. This 8-percent tax will bring in $364 billion in new revenue over the next 5 years, and combined with these reforms will be completely revenue neutral as prescribed by President Reagan. Perhaps more importantly, the BTT will correct an inequity in the current tax system that puts American products at a tax disadvantage.

Business would calculate the tax by adding up revenues and subtracting all costs except interest, dividends, and salaries. The 8 percent will be applied against the difference. The employer will be permitted to credit his BTT against his FICA, or Social Security, payments. Any excess BTT above the Social Security payroll credit will also be deductible against the corporate income tax.

Under the business transfer tax, all organizations with an income of $10 million or less will be exempted. This will serve to protect small business and the family farm.

To level the playing field in the trade arena, the BTT will be rebated on American exports and levied on foreign imports. This will result in foreign firms paying 40 percent of the $364 billion, and it will represent a substantial tax reduction on the part of the American taxpayer.

I believe this tax reform proposal will move our industry, and consequently our country, into tomorrow. And we will arrive before our competition. My reforms are targeted to stimulate the American economy and to give us the edge in international trade. And keeping with the spirit of this administration, they will be profamily, proemployment, probusiness, protrade—in short—pro-American. And nothing can be as important.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an addendum to my statement entitled "The Roth Reforms."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROTH REFORMS

(Remarks by Senator William V. Roth, Jr.)

REMARKS TO NATIONAL PRESS CLUB

Thank you, Mary Kay (Quinlan—NPC President). I'm honored to be speaking to such a prestigious organization.

I know there exists the eternal question concerning the relationship between press and politician. Is it adversarial or friendly-cooperative? Well, in the name of time and safety, I'll leave this to be answered by the scholars. But I will say that I believe a free press is not a privilege, but an organic necessity in a great society.

And ours is a great society. Besides, I think President Harry Truman answered the question when he said, "If a politician is looking for a friend in Washington, let him buy a dog!"

But actually, to be a free press in America is not enough. Freedom from something is never enough. It must be freedom for something. In 1965, Walter Lippmann said: "Without criticism and reliable reporting, the government cannot govern." And I believe that in this age of communication, journalists must be ever-present. You must remain in every quarter of the world. And through use of the facts and issues, you must continue to give life to theories and ideas.

For this reason, I have come here today. This afternoon, I would like to shake the Muse who governs the media. I would like to introduce you to the third and final version of an idea whose time has come. And I would like to show you how this idea, simple in theory, will revolutionize the economic character of our nation.

Benjamin Franklin once said, "Nothing is certain but death and taxes." I don't think he knew then that one day those two words would become mutually inclusive. High taxes, along with other factors—including over-regulation—came close, not too many years ago, to choking the life out of an economy that once served as the world's model.

These factors resulted in what President Jimmy Carter called the malaise of the 70's—the days when double-digit inflation, interest rates at 21 percent, and soaring unemployment ground away at the American dream.

We can all recall the headlines. Chronicled in magazines and newspapers—coming into our living rooms night after night on television—was a story of economic decline and frustration. The gas lines, the sagging building industry, the banished hopes of young couples to own their own homes—they were all a part of that era.

Thank goodness times have changed. And they've changed for the better. Of course, in the beginning, the term "Reaganomics" was used by the President's opponents to describe what they thought was an economic pipedream. But soon it became an exciting concept as Ronald Reagan became the first president in more than 20 years to bring down both unemployment and inflation.

Between December 1982 and September 1985 nearly nine million Americans went back to work. Today inflation is about four percent, interest rates are below ten percent, and the results are outstanding. Our once waning spirit has been rekindled. And I think we have to agree with the President when he says, "America is Back."

I'm proud to be a part of this recovery with the Kemp-Roth tax cuts, and I invite anyone who cannot see or feel the excitement of our country's great comeback to take a trip outside the beltway and talk to the people back home.

Today is an exciting era in which we live. Mankind has labored for thousands of years to open the frontier of technology. And we now stand ripe for progress. Today's hi-tech revolution gives us every reason to be positive. And along with the present strength of our economy, it holds the keys to a bright future.

But we also face some challenges. We face stiff competition from abroad. Whether you're talking about Japan or the rim of Asia—countries that are growing by six; seven, eight, or nine percent—these countries have demonstrated beyond all question a competence in this new world of high technology. They also have the means to buy the best technology in the world. In most cases it's American technology, and they are using it to produce better products at better prices. And, ironically, these countries don't have nearly the resources we enjoy. Like us, they have a population of bright, educated, well-motivated people. But they also have the advantage of a ready source of revenue from their high rate of savings. In Japan, this savings can be as high as 20 percent of an individual's disposable income. And this money means capital—capital to continuously modernize.

New technology is the order of the day, and countries that are best able to maintain the most modern industries are going to emerge in this new world economy as the leaders of tomorrow.

The fundamental question, then, is how do we meet the challenge of this foreign competition? How do we develop the policies that will continue to boost economic growth and jobs? And what should we be doing to help America compete in this new world economy?

Today, I will concentrate on tax initiatives that are critical to answer these questions. Specifically, I believe there are four tax goals the government must set to help our people capitalize on our economy's recent turnaround.

First, we must reduce the burden of federal income tax on middle America.

Second, we must eliminate the bias against savings that exists in our present tax code.

Third, our tax policy must encourage our industry to be the most modern, the most efficient in the world as that means growth and jobs. It must also promote the modernization of industries basic to America's role as the shield of the free world.

And fourth, our tax policy must encourage trade.

By promoting policies that stimulate progress in these four areas, government will allow America to meet today's challenges. But to reduce the marginal rate of federal income tax for all Americans, to promote savings to strengthen the security of the American family, to modernize industry and increase employment, and to balance international trade, is a difficult charge. To find the revenue and means is even more difficult, especially to do it in a revenue neutral way, and at a time when the budget deficit is demanding our attention.

But, I believe it can, and it will be done.

President Reagan has advised us that Tax Reform is a key to future growth and prosperity. And I agree. But I also agree with the President that what's not needed is a tax increase. That's not the panacea. In fact, prescribing a tax increase now would be like a prescription of marshmallows for a man on a diet. If the past is any guide for the future, we know that raising revenues will only raise spending. Despite the promises, it's been the story time and again—so often, in fact, that I believe political economy are two words that should be divorced on grounds of incompatibility.

Now, there are a number of reform packages that are floating around Washington, even as we speak. In fact, just about everybody has a personal idea about what tax reform should be. But it's against the four criteria I listed for economic growth that we must judge the numerous proposals.

Recently, the House passed its version of tax reform. HR 3838 is a reform package that I believe seeks to ease the tax burden borne by the middle class, but it doesn't go far enough, nor does it promote the other three areas I've outlined as necessary for our continued economic growth. Rather, it continues the bias against savings, the high cost of capital, and the imbalance in international trade. In fact, the House proposal would do little to encourage the trend of increasing employment opportunity. It would do little to increase jobs for our young and unemployed.

In short, the House proposal is anti-growth—it's anti-jobs.

This brings us to the question: If not HR 3838, then what? Who has the answer?

In his essay, "Self-Reliance," Emerson teaches us that we should abide by our own spontaneous impressions with good-humored inflexibility, lest we be forced to take with shame our own opinion from another.

Now, having said that—need I say more!

I call my proposal the Roth Reforms, and I'm proud to say that together they meet each of the four criteria.

First, the individual's marginal rate of income taxes would be reduced to four rates of 15-20-25 and 30 percent. The typical middle class American would enjoy an average reduction of at least 8 percentage points in the marginal rate of tax. Our more affluent would be in the 30 percent bracket, or in twice as high a tax bracket as our lower income families.

Second, the Roth Reforms would promote savings. We would establish Super Savings Accounts (or SUSAs), similar to IRAs, that would allow an individual to save up to $3,000 tax free or $6,000 for families. And unlike the money they have locked-in in Individual Retirement Accounts, the money in these SUSAs could be withdrawn at any time, for any purpose, and without penalty. And only upon withdrawal would the money be taxed. Now, families could save for college educations. Young couples could save for their first down payment. And older couples could save for retirement, or for anything they wanted. The SUSAs are pro-family and pro-America for they represent a new source of capital that will help family needs and keep American industry up-to-date.

For similar reasons, that is to promote family savings, the Roth Reforms will also retain the current law for 401K Pension Plans.

And, finally, we will recognize the contribution of the homemaker to the American economy by increasing the IRA savings potential for housewives, or househusbands, from $250 to $2,000.

Next, to promote growth and modernization in the private sector and to regain our competitive edge in the international marketplace, my proposal would:

Reduce the top corporate federal tax rate to 33 percent—13 percentage points lower than current law and 3 percentage points lower than the House provision.

And we would introduce an Expense Cost Recovery System that allows firms to expense half their equipment costs and depreciate the remainder according to President Reagan's Capital Cost Recovery System. This step will both help modernize our basic industries, so important to our security as well as help new technology to be incorporated in all American industry. As I have already stated, if the United States is to be the number one industrial nation, it must have the most up-to-date industrial facilities.

Now, how do we do all this? These reforms are expensive. And the question arises: How do we make up for the lost revenue? The answer is an 8 percent business transfer tax. As proposed in my package, this BTT would bring in $364 billion in new revenue over the next five years. Combined with these reforms, it would be completely revenue neutral as prescribed by the President.

Businesses would calculate the tax by adding up revenues and subtracting all costs except interest, dividends, and salaries and then applying the 8 percent tax against the difference. Next, the employer would be permitted to credit his BTT against his FICA—or Social Security payments. This helps employment as it lowers the up front cost of new employees. Any excess BTT above the Social Security Payroll Credit would also be deductible against the corporate income tax. And it's important to mention here that the BTT would in no way have an affect on the integrity of the Social Security system.

Under the Business Transfer Tax, all organizations with an income of $10 million or less would be exempted. This would serve to protect small business and the family farm.

And of the $364 billion—over the five year period—40 percent would be paid for by foreign firms. This alone will allow the BTT to represent a substantial tax reduction on the part of the American taxpayer.

Now, President Reagan has said we must level the playing field in the trade arena, and this is what the BTT would do. In trade, the United States is disadvantaged. Under international rules—better known as GATT—certain types of taxes can be rebated or refunded to the manufacturer as goods are exported. But income taxes cannot.

Under these rules, many European countries and Japan have an advantage over their American trading partner. When Bill Brock was the U.S. Trade Representative he illustrated this by saying the American automobile manufacturer has, on the average, a $600 tax disadvantage.

For example, by the time a Toyota rolls into the showroom in the United States, its Japanese producer has already received a rebate on the taxes he paid in Japan. And he paid almost no taxes when the car came into this country. When an American auto manufacturer sells a car in Japan, it doesn't receive a tax rebate when the auto leaves the U.S. And furthermore, it encounters a large excise tax at the border of Japan. The result is a tax holiday for foreign exporters while Americans are double taxed.

My plan will correct this inequity. The BTT will be rebated on American exports and it will be paid as products enter our market. For example, if that Toyota cost $8,000, the Japanese exporter will be required to pay a $640 Business Transfer Tax. In other words, my plan will level the playing field for international trade.

Let me re-emphasize that because the foreign exporter must pay its BTT, 40 percent of the new tax will be paid by foreign business firms. This alone will shift a great deal of the tax burden off the American people.

Now, let me take a moment and explain how the full tax reforms will benefit working America.

For low-income families with an annual gross of $15,000 and the standard deductions, tax payment under current law would be $818. However, under my plan these families would pay $330 for a savings of almost $500.

If you're making $32,000, with itemized deductions of $4,736, under current law you would pay $3,665 in federal income taxes. Under my proposal—$2,881. A savings of $784.

Let's say you're making $45,000, you're a family of four, and you have $8,984 in itemized deductions. Under current law, you would pay $5,877 in federal income tax. Under my proposal, however, you would only pay $4,878, for a savings of almost $1,000.

If your income range is $75,000, and you have $11,000 in itemized deductions, current law demands $15,502. The Roth Reforms would call for $11,225. This is a savings of $4,277. And remember, one of the purposes of tax reform is to get the more affluent out of tax shelters and to put their money to a more productive use.

The Super Savings Account, and the increased IRA for housewives, would alter even further the amount of your return. For every $1,000 placed in a SUSA or IRA, your tax savings would range from $150 in the low income bracket to $300 in the high.

In closing, let me say I'm a firm believer that Americans are proud to pay taxes, but I think they'd be just as proud for half the money. I believe this tax reform would move our industry into tomorrow. And we would arrive before our competitors. President Reagan has said the tax cuts Americans have received so far have stirred a spirit of risk-taking and have helped rouse America's economy. Well, if the cuts so far have done that, then I believe we should just go right ahead and wake the economy up. And I know of few Americans who wouldn't sacrifice their taxes to help to do just that.

In short, my reforms are targeted to stimulate the American economy and to give us the edge in international trade. They will allow us to continue in our role as a shield for the free world, with a strengthened economy and with renewed vigor in our basic and technological industries. And keeping with the spirit of this Administration, they will be profamily, proemployment, probusiness, protrade—in short—they will be pro-American.

Because, put simply, they will once again reward Ambition in America with more than just high taxes.

Thank you.

SUMMARY

Individual Rate Structure: Four rates set at 15, 20, 25 and 30 percent. $2,000 personal exemption extended to itemizers in the bottom tax bracket. Top capital gains rate of 20 percent. Retains deduction for state and local taxes.

Savings Provisions: $3,000 Super Savings Account (SUSA) ($6,000 for couples filing jointly), phased in over 3 years. Retain current law for 401K Pension Plans. Increase spousal IRA to $2,000.

Business Provisions: Top corporate rate of 33 percent. Expense Cost Recovery System (ECRS). Firms would expense half of equipment costs and depreciate remainder according to President's Capital Cost Recovery System. Corporate Minimum Tax Rate set at 15 percent. Money set aside for other areas and BTT transition rules.

Business Transfer Tax (BTT): 8 percent tax on net business receipts. BTT fully creditable against FICA tax. Excess BTT above FICA deductible against income for corporate or individual income tax. Firms with gross receipts of less than $10 million exempt from BTT. ⅗ vote of both Houses of Congress required to increase BTT rate.

EXPLANATION OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

The Roth Reforms will achieve the primary goals of tax reform—to protect middle class taxpayers from unfair tax burdens, to reduce the cost of capital to American business, to diminish the anti-savings bias in the tax code, and to promote U.S. exports. These reforms will create an environment of economic growth and will enhance America's international competitiveness.

The Roth Reforms will be advanced by Senator Roth during the Senate Finance Committee's deliberations on tax reform. Since the Finance Committee's mark-up document is not completed, the changes listed should be viewed in reference to the House tax reform bill, H.R. 3838. Adjustments will be made, when necessary, after the Finance Committee document is available.

INDIVIDUAL RATE STRUCTURE

Rates: In some instances, under H.R. 3838, taxpayers would face higher marginal rates than under current law. To encourage work effort and savings, and to remove the incentive to invest in unproductive tax shelters, rates must be lowered even more. The Roth proposal contains a four rate structure with rates set at 15, 20, 25, and 30 percent. The attached chart shows the brackets associated with these rates. The Roth reforms would retain the deduction for state and local taxes and set the top capital gains rate at 20 percent.

Personal Exemption: To protect working taxpayers who itemize deductions, the $2,000 personal exemption would be extended to those in the 15 percent tax bracket.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS
